FLOUR.—Nearly all in first hands on the spot and considerable to arrived were sold at the date of our last review, but little has been done since. Holders refuse to sell unless at a marked advance, and are mostly holding for higher prices, which are ruling with an upward tendency, the stock on hand being very light and the prospect for supplies unfavorable.

Monetary.

We have no improvement to notice in the money market proper. The pressure continues unabated and extreme rates are paid on even the best commercial paper. The banks are compelled to confine themselves to the renewal of maturing obligations, and there is very little capital available in the open market.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.

The next session of this Institution commences on the 19th September, 1867. As evidence of her success as an educator of young men, she points to her graduates, all over the South. No location surpasses this in point of health. The town of Boydton and surrounding country has but one physician, and he is but half employed. In addition to the school of Moral Philosophy, Ancient Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Modern Languages, we have also a school of Commercial Science, in which are taught the branches of a business education. Young men attend any schools they wish, and get a showing for whatever they accomplish. It is our intention hereafter, to fill up our vacations with a special session, so that young men can review any studies they wish, and more particularly to teach English grammar, Commercial Arithmetic, Book-keeping, Penmanship, and Commercial Law. Thus, our students can take the Literary and Scientific course during the session, and get a practical instruction in business during the vacations. The Special Session in vacation covers the heated term in the South when business is over, and young men already engaged in business can come here to perfect their knowledge of Commercial Science, and return to the South in time to resume business.

Expenses for ten months, including meals, use of furniture, (averaged), fuel, lights, washing, matriculation and contingent fee, tuition in three schools, so as to occupy the student's whole time—$300, one-half payable at the commencement of each term.

A daily line of hacks, Sundays excepted, runs from Roanoke station (Richmond & Danville Railroad) to Boydton. Send for circulars.

Natchez District Conference, in Woodville, Sept. 26th,

The attendance was fair, some of members doubtless being kept by flying rumors of yellow fever. The various interests of Church were considered, and of them pointedly discussed.
The usual committees were appointed and made reports.
The committee on S. Schools and Church Literature have furnished following statistics of S. S.
S. Schools reported. 8
Superintendents. 8
Scholars. 348
Teachers. 12
Vols. in Library. 900 pieces S. S. Visitors taken. . . . 80 S. S. Star. 30
This is certainly only a partial report.

It is thought that the meagreness of the circulation of Church literature is mainly due to want of money. We think the people have the desire for information, the disposition to read, and the inclination to support the Church papers.
We have not been remiss in soliciting subscriptions. We hope the time soon come when the material needed for the promotion of the church interests may be safeguarded to us by the bounty-bestower of all goods.

Assigned, C. R. GONFREY, Chm'n, T. J. SULLIVAN, G. H. WILEY, by resolution, special attention effort were pledged towards circulation of the N. O. CHRI-STIAN ADVOCATE and SABBATH SCHOOL VISITOR. Also by resolution, the N. O. C. ADVOCATE, MEMPHIS EPISCOPAL METHODIST, NASHVILLE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, were recommended to our people as highly valuable and representatives of our Church Literature.

The proper Committee submitted the following REPORT ON MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.
The committee to whom was referred the subject of Ministerial support, respectfully submit the following report.

In the Natchez District, the number of preachers in regular rank (including Presiding Elder) is ten. Ten months of the ecclesiastical year have passed, and it appears that to these ten men, there have been paid three thousand dollars, that is, thirty dollars per month.

The Church is of Divine appointment; needful for men's spiritual growth; for the preservation of moral health, and to secure a body social from moral punishment. It is divinely announced, that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel. It is the demand of civilization, and a principle of common sense, that payment should be proportioned to the value of work.

It has been long known that in this country the salaries of ministers have been miserably inadequate to their wants, and far below the acknowledged worth of their work. They have ministered spiritual things, and have been paid in destitution. For the good of the people, and to secure justice to the ministry, there must be a thorough change in all that pertains to the business relations of the church to the ministry.

The Committee would suggest:
1. That the Stewards of each station and circuit, call upon the members of their respective churches, to subscribe whatever amount each may be inclined to pay as a part of the preacher's salary; that these promises to pay be taken in the form of a legal obligation, and that the amounts be made payable quarterly, in advance, to the Stewards.

2. That every member refusing to subscribe, be registered on the Steward's list, with zero opposite his name, and that any subscriber refusing to pay, be proceeded against by the Stewards, according to the disciplinary requirements concerning delinquent debtors.

3. That the whole amount subscribed, be ascertained in time to be reported to the fourth Quarterly Conference, in order that it may be reported to the Bishop and his council at the ensuing Annual Conference.

4. That every station or circuit, which fails to subscribe an adequate amount for the preacher's support, shall be accounted as declaring pecuniary inability or indisposition to meet the demand, and that it be dropped from the regular work, and be made a missionary field.

Respectfully submitted,
P. LANE, Chm'n
J. L. FORTNEY,
B. STEWART.

The above report was received after considerable discussion and some opposition, all agreeing that something definite regarding this matter must be done, and done speedily.

The fact is, nearly every other denomination has left the field for want of support, and now, the Methodist preachers who, for some reason, have continued faithfully supplying the people with the word, seem about to be pushed to the wall. Very many are partially engaged in secular pursuits.
The prospect for exclusive devotion to the ministry, seems gloomier than ever before. The urgency of just claims, the high price of every necessary of life, the unfavorable season and consequent shortness of the crops, and failure of the Churches to pay, have made these men seek deeply to know of whom they are called, and the value of their work. Hence, this effort is made to stir if possible, the Stewards, and the Church, and the people, to renewed efforts to secure a living ministry to the land.

The committee on the State of the Church, for some reason did not report, but from reports of pastors, we judge the Church to be in an advancing condition.
Many fruitful revivals and seasons of grace, and accessions are reported.

The missionary collections have generally been postponed until the results of the year's labors in the fields could be realized, and under the present prospects they will be small.

The lay delegates to Annual Conference, are L. K. Barbary, Jno. McVea, Geo. J. Dick, Geo.
H. Wiley, Alt. notes, Charles

McGhee, T. F. Collins, James H.
Mose, and Geo. Baynard.
Thos. W. BROWN, Sec'y.

The balance of the report of this District Meeting, we reserve until next week. — [EDITOR.]

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

THE RIGHT PLAN.

For a long time many of our Conferences have given attention to the subject of educating promising young men who offer for our ministry. Several have taken steps in that direction, and been more or less successful. The difficulty seemed to be that the Conferences were already as much burdened with financial affairs as they could afford to be. To order other annual collections, or put other agents in the field, a majority have always felt would embarrass the gospel.

Still the General Conference, and Annual Conferences, were solicitous to see some plan in operation, whereby the half educated young men, with good minds and noble hearts, who are brought into our ministry, might receive some farther advantages than those which their parents were able to afford them. It was easy to devise plans, but to execute them in these troubled times was very difficult.

Providence has accomplished it all for us. Not by order of the General Conference, nor by any proper law or authority, but by some influence moving upon the minds and hearts of our people, the District Meeting has become an institution amongst us, and a glorious success.

Bishops, Preachers, and people, all join in hearty approval. What have these District Meetings done?
We can speak for our own and one other. At the recent District Meeting of the Montgomery District, Mont. Conf., which met at Auburn, Bishops Andrew and Wightman, presiding, the usual questions were discussed, all eliciting much interest from the laity, and kindling sparks that will burn to a blaze among the people they represented.

It was good to see with what hearty good will they passed a resolution to educate at the East Alabama College, a young man preparing for the ministry, to be chosen from the bonds of the District. It was mentioned that there were several ready and worthy. A committee of five pastors was appointed to select the man.

Three weeks later it was my good fortune to attend the Meeting of the Enfauila District, Mont. Conf., when no Bishop presided, but the same interest was manifest, and the same good seed were sown.

When the question of educating a young preacher was introduced, I noticed that it aroused more interest than any other. In my humble judgment they fell upon a better plan than that adopted by the Montgomery District. It was resolved, that the pastors on the District be instructed to take collections in all the churches for this purpose, and that a central committee be appointed to receive these funds, select the young man, and make the educational arrangement. It is thought from the interest taken, that enough will be raised to educate more than one.

Thus, it seems that Providence has solved for us the question of ministerial education. Let it be the good and glorious work of the District Meeting. Let each district select the young men from its own bonds, when there are any who apply. Thus shall it be a home, a family interest. Send them all to your Conference College. They will associate together and wield a hallowed influence there; and, instead of being polished by rubbing them together, so these young men shall come forth, many of them bright jewels to ornament the dia-dem of the Bride. — Dr. Bisco.

A Letter from Gen. Butler.

OUR NATIONAL FINANCES.

Sir—A friend has sent me a slip from your weekly, containing the Tribune's reply to my letter on the subject of National Finances.

My high respect for the editor, the paper and its readers, prompts me to a rejoinder, which may contain a little more clearly the exact statement of the question at issue between us.

My most earnest desire is that the government shall fully, honestly and exactly meet everyone of its obligations, according to the exact and equitable condition of every contract it has made with its creditors. I would advocate nothing short of this, and justice and good faith require nothing more.

I asserted that the 5-20 bonds were payable as to their principal in currency, and not in gold. This the Tribune denies, and insists that they are payable in gold.

The whole question is, what was the contract between the government and its creditors?

The first $50,000,000 loan of Aug.
1863, was issued at $730 interest—principal and interest payable in gold—was so taken, and so paid.
When the 5-20 loan bill was passed it established the interest at six per cent, payable in gold, but said nothing as to the currency in which the principal was to be paid.

When the 5-20 loan was before Congress, Judge Spaulding, of Ohio, asked Mr. Stevens, Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who reported it, if the principal of these bonds was payable in gold as well as the interest; to which Mr. Stevens replied that the principal was not payable in gold.

At the same session, when the first 5-20 loan bill was passed, the legal tender act was also passed, providing for the issue of what are now known as "greenbacks." It was therein provided and so printed on the back of every note that it is legal tender for every debt, public and private, except duties on imports and the interest on the public debt. If it was not to be received for principal of the public debt, why except the interest?

B sides, the act made it receivable by the United States for all its loans, and specially convertible into 5-20 bonds.

Again, in the following Congress, while a portion of the 5-20 loan was yet untaken, another 10-40 loan was authorized, at 5 per cent. interest; both principal and interest of which,
by the terms of the act, were made payable in gold.

Now, if it was the contract of the Government that the 6 per cent.
5-20 bonds were interest and principal, payable in gold, although directly the contrary was stated on their face, why was it that the Government offered a 10-40 loan at 5 per cent. interest and principal both payable in gold?

In other words, how could the government expect the 5 per cent. gold-payable and gold-bearing loan to be taken up, when it had the 6 per cent. gold-payable and gold-bearing loan still before the country?

You say that the Tribune was largely, zealously instrumental; at the request of government, through its agents, in persuading the people to let the government have their money for the bonds. We assured them, day after day, that every one would be paid in full in coin, principal and interest.

Now, the 10-40 loan was put upon the market by Jay Cooke, as the agent of the Treasury, and if you will consult the files of the Tribune containing the advertisement of that loan, you will find that Jay Cooke advertised the 10-40 loan as the only loan of the Government the principal and interest of which was payable in gold.

I have not seen that advertisement in the Tribune, but it was so advertised; and I assume Jay Cooke took advantage of so valuable a medium of advertising as your paper, to make known that important fact of the desirability of the 10-40 loan, as he certainly did so advertise in other papers.

You further say: "Gen. Butler uttered no word of dissent then," i. e., when the loan was upon the market. True, because there was no occasion. And still another, and perhaps equally available answer—Gen. Butler at that time had other public interests in another branch of the service to contemplate and try to serve.

Again: You do not deny that this 5-20 loan, in whatever it is payable, is now due at the option of the United States. That is, the five years have passed at the end of which, by their terms, the United States reserved the right to pay them; and the Government has the right to pay them to day in whatever current the contract calls for —whether gold or paper.

If these bonds are payable in gold, why are they selling at from 108 to 112 in currency when gold is worth 143 to 145?

If the United States should now choose to exercise its right to pay them, (which would seem to be wise, as they are intaxable, so that their interest is, in fact, from one to three per cent. higher than six per cent. to the holder,) in that case why should the Government be called upon to pay them in gold or its equivalent in currency, say 143, when anybody else can buy them at 112?

Why should the tax-payers be called upon to pay the holder from 30 to 40 per cent. more in order to redeem these bonds than, as they now have the right to do, the capitalist is now willing to sell them for to anybody else?

Assuming that a man can doubt, in view of the legislation of Congress, and the words of the contract, that these bonds are payable in currency, my next proposition is that the United States shall issue a new loan upon such terms as sound finance shall show to be most advantageous, and with the proceeds to pay its 5-20 creditors, and thus reduce the rate of interest, while at the same time it keeps exact faith in its contracts.

I am unable to see that this is a "dodge" or "repudiation," which is a longer synonym for "cassidy," or anything "irreconcilable with common honesty." These be hard words, my masters. As I do not think they add anything to the strength of the Tribune's argument upon a legal question relating to finance, I certainly can neither reply to nor return them.

I only propose to reply to the specific argument of the Tribune, and, therefore, refrain from discussing any of the collateral branches of the subject.

Very truly yours,
B. F. BUTLER.

What a Bondholder Says About Paying the National Debt in Greenbacks.

The following letter, which we take from the Ohio Statesman, will be found worth a careful perusal:

SARASVILLE, NORLE Co., Ohio, September 17, 1867.

Sir—In reviewing the speeches of those patriots and statesmen of Ohio, Thurman and Pendleton, on the political issues of the day, I, although a bondholder, indorse their views in regard to the finances of the country to the letter; and I go further, and say that every financial act of Congress for the last six years has been done with an eye single to the benefit of the capitalists of the country. It was all hatched and matured under their supervision.

Now for the proof: The first paper issued by the Government, during the war, was called "Demand Notes." They were receivable by the Government for duties on imports, hence they were at par with gold. They were circulated all over the country to the amount of about three hundred millions.

The next issue was of "legal tenders." Now you could pay your debts with the legal tenders, but you could not with the demand notes, if objected to, hence the legal tenders were sought after instead of the demand notes; the result was, that before the commonality of the people were aware of the real value of the demand notes, they were all hoarded up by the capitalists, their net profits on this issue being about one hundred millions.

I had seven thousand dollars in gold at the commencement of the war; I sold the same in the first year of the war at 40 per cent. premium, which brought me nine thousand and eight hundred dollars in legal tenders, exchanged them even for demand notes, kept them for eighteen months, and then sold them for twenty thousand dollars, legal tender, and bought 7-30 notes at 93 per 100, converted them into 5-20s even; here I have twenty thousand dollars in 5-20s, and two hundred dollars in greenbacks to spare. I am now, and have been drawing from the Government twelve hundred dollars in gold per annum on seven thousand dollars, at 13 per cent. interest, and the principal advanced from $7,000 to $20,000 and two hundred dollar, to pay the preacher, if I thought he was deserving of it. Verily, is not S. P. Chase a great financier? I as before stated, indorse the Democratic idea of paying off those bonds at any time after five years, in legal tenders—the same currency we bought them with, though they are worth now but 71 to the $100.— When I brought my 5-20s of the agent, I was informed that the interest would be paid in gold, and the principal in currency. How long the laboring masses of the country will endure this, time will determine. More anon.

Yours, respectfully,
WM. J. YOUNG.

The Northern Press on the recent Election.

WASHINGTON, October 10. — The Times' special is good authority for the statement that the President has announced that, in view of the recent elections, he will make some changes in his Cabinet.

The Herald's special has all manner of rumors of Cabinet changes.
It is probable some changes will be made before the session of Congress, but none are yet determined upon.

The World's special says the friends of the Administration are confident of important changes in the Cabinet, to be followed by the wholesale decapitation of minor officials. The President will take a stand which will astonish the country. Thomas Ewing and Erasmus Corning are mentioned for the Treasury. Seward will probably send in his resignation from Auburn, and Reverdy Johnson can be his successor.

The Tribune's special says the President will be sworn Thursday night, when he will define his future policy. It is generally believed that changes will be made in the Cabinet. It is stated that ex-Gov.
Seymour will succeed Seward, P. P.
Blair, McClelland and Ewing are named for the War Office. Black and Cowan are mentioned as successors to McCulloch. Gen. Howard is to be sent to the Plains, and Judge Holt got rid of.

The Herald editorially says the recent elections do not denote Democratic victories, but that the Republican element of the country has stepped aside to rebuke its leaders.

The World says the elections are a unanimous and indignant veto upon the policy of the party in power.

The Times says the elections indicate no universal confidence in the Democratic party, but simply a reaction against the extreme acts and measures of the Republican party, and convey an admonition which ought to be salutary to its leaders.

The Tribune says the vital principle of genuine Democracy will march on through seeming defeat to inevitable and conclusive triumph; through whatever trials of its consistency, of its consistency, the great party will move right on to the arduous but inevitable achievement of equal rights for all.

The Journal of Commerce says the Republican leaders vainly thought they could lead the whole nation to the consummation of their wildest unconstitutional projects, but the more thoughtful of the masses have refused to follow. If the elections do nothing more than divide parties more equally, and thus check party arrogance, the effort will not have been lost.

The Sun says the mass of the Northern people desire a reconstruction policy giving security against future rebellion and are opposed to the spiteful schemes of the Republican extremists. Through the elections they have spoken, and if the Republican party would save itself further reverses it must cast overboard the vagaries of certain leaders.

A correspondent of the Episcopalian says: "We know that Bishop Mellvaine will not consecrate a church in his diocese in which a communion table, and that only, is not the permanent furniture of the church, and that he is right; and the only consistent bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of whom we have heard."

The Christian Witness, Protestant Episcopal, says: "Ninety years ago we had one clergyman to every ten thousand of the people; now we have only one to every fifteen thousand, and this discrepancy is increasing. The past two years the additions have not filled the places made vacant by death and disability. In some dioceses there is not a single candidate for orders today. The East has not a single clergyman to spare for the West; there is not a diocese where parishes are not a number of years out of the hands of the clergy."

The District Meeting of Tuscaloosa District—Mobile Conference, Assembled at Flat Woods Church, Havana Circuit, on Thursday, Sept. 25th, 1867.

Bishop Wightman presided with his accustomed dignity and Christian courtesy. Prof. J. C. Wills, of the Southern University, preached the introductory sermon. All parts of the District were represented, there being in attendance, the Presiding Elder, nine preachers belonging to the Annual Conference, four local preachers, two Sunday School Superintendents, and fourteen stewards. The neighboring brethren and friends had not only made ample provision for the accommodation of visitors, but dispensed their hospitality in so kind and Christian a manner as to call for a hearty vote of thanks at the close of the meeting.

The sessions began at nine o'clock, at eleven preaching, after which an intermission of about an hour for refreshments, abundantly provided for the occasion, and then the transaction of business until 5 o'clock. The committees met at night at different houses in the neighborhood. The business sessions closed on Saturday afternoon. On Sunday, Love-Fest, preaching by the Bishop and Dr. Wadsworth, with the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, furnished a season of great spiritual enjoyment to the people of God, and their hearts were gladdened by the addition of six adults to the church.

One of the most important items of business transacted during the meeting was the hearty endorsement of the Southern University Relief Association, inaugurated at the Summerfield District meeting, some two weeks previous. This Association proposes to furnish temporary relief to the University, now suffering in common with the whole South, under great pecuniary embarrassment. Subscribers bind themselves to pay annually on the first January, for the term of two years, the sum of twenty dollars for the support of the Southern University, which sum the Treasurer of the Association shall pay over to the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees of the University, to be distributed as may seem advisable to them for the support of the Faculty of the Institution. In case the annual income from the same should exceed the amount necessary to make up any deficiency in the salary of the Professors, the surplus shall constitute a part of the permanent endowment of the University.

The scheme was cordially approved, giving rise to an interesting discussion, after which twenty-five subscribers were obtained. This earnestly hoped that the friends of the Institution will send in their names as subscribers, either to Bishop Wightman, President, or to Prof. N. T. Lupton, Treasurer of the Association, Greensboro, Ala.

Only one or two of those present had ever before participated in a District Meeting. All left this one, satisfied that these meetings have introduced a new era into Methodism, that new life and power will thereby be infused into the church and the work of spreading scriptural holiness throughout the land greatly promoted.

Reports were presented by the various Committees, the Chairmen of which had wisely been designated sometime previous by Bro. Cotton, the Presiding Elder, and the discussions thereon were deeply interesting.

(Resolutions were also passed upon "CHURCH EXTENSION," "ON THE RELATIONS OF THE COLORED PEOPLE," "ON CHURCH LITERATURE," and "ON TEMPERANCE," differing in nothing from the Resolutions common to all District Meetings upon the subjects.)

—EDITOR.

ON EDUCATION.

The main feature of this Report was the presentation of the plan for a Southern Relief Association, which as stated above, was heartily approved by the meeting. The whole plan can be found in the former part of this communication. Bishop Wightman elected President, Prof. O. F. Carr, Secy; and Prof. N. T. Lupton, Treasurer of the Association, who are prepared to receive subscribers.

ON THE RELATIONS AND OFFICE OF LOCAL PREACHERS.

Resolved, That we fully appreciate the importance of the local ministry, as well calculated to co-operate with, and supplement the itinerant system; and think that something should be done to render it more extensively useful.

Resolved, That the standard for admission into the local ministry should be raised, the examination of candidates conducted with greater care, and that our Quarterly Conferences should be induced to act in this matter with circumspection and prayerful deliberation.

Resolved, That local preachers should be required to pursue the same course of study as itinerant ministers, and should be placed on the same footing, in respect to ordination.

Resolved, That they should be required to labor, both as preachers and pastors, their fields of labor being assigned to them by the Presiding Elder of the District, to which they belong, and that when they become idle and indifferent as ministers of the gospel, their credentials should be taken from them.

Resolved, That no itinerant minister should be allowed to locate on account of anything which renders him unacceptable to the people as a preacher of the gospel, but in such case, the authority to preach should be withdrawn; and that it is a slur upon the local ministry to allow such preachers to enter their ranks.

Resolved, That whatever may be the defects or the excellences of the system of local preachers, its usefulness will depend mainly upon the piety and zeal of the members belonging to it, and that we earnestly call upon our local brethren to give themselves up more heartily to God, and the work of the ministry.

ON FINANCE.

Resolved, That it is the imperative duty of each and every Christian, in whatever sphere he may be placed, to contribute cheerfully to the support of the church, according as God has prospered him.

Resolved, That in the language of our Discipline, "As it is the ordinance of God that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel," stewards should feel themselves solemnly bound to afford a competent support to those who are appointed to labor among them."

Resolved, That to facilitate the speedy and systematic collection of voluntary contributions to the church, the following plan is adopted:

1st. Let the stewards at the beginning of each pastoral year make as near an estimate as possible, of the whole amount necessary for the support of the circuit or station, and if a circuit, apportion the amount to be raised by each charge.

2d: Let the stewards assess each individual member, the amount which in their judgment, he or she should pay, and lay the estimates and assessments before the church, at a meeting of the members, called as soon as practicable. Should any member refuse to pay any or all of the amount which he or she has been assessed, let it be at once apportioned among the other members, so that certain provision be made at the beginning of each year, for the expenses of the church.

3d. Let each member distinctly understand that payment will be expected quarterly in advance.

4th. Near the close of each year, let the steward make a detailed statement of their financial operations, to a meeting of the church, and should there be a deficit, let immediate provisions be made for raising the required amount.

Resolved, That the stewards are greatly aided in their financial operations by the faithful discharge of pastoral duty on the part of preachers.

MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

A resolution was passed requesting the preachers in charge, to read the report and resolutions of the Committee on Finance, to their several charges, and also a resolution directing the publication in our church papers, of the Report on the Relations and Office of Local Preachers. These reports are enclosed, which it is hoped you will publish.

The Presiding Elder of this District, Rev. J. L. Cotton, having received and distributed for the relief of the destitute, through Dr. T. O. Summers and Bishop McTyeire, $300, which is understood to have been contributed by our brethren of California, therefore Resolved, That this District Meeting make grateful acknowledgments to our brethren of California, for the timely relief thus furnished, and feel our Christian fellowship deepened by this benefit bestowed and received.

Resolved, That the above resolution be forwarded to the CALIFORNIA ADVOCATE for publication.

The Bishop, and Rev. T. C. Weir, were appointed a Committee, to collect facts in reference to the life and death of our late beloved Bro. C. C. Callaway.

Alfred Battle, Esq., Capt. R. B. Allen, Hon. Joseph W. Taylor, and Prof. N. T. Lupton, were elected delegates, to the Annual Conference.

N. T. Lupton, Secy.

Marianna District Meeting—Montgomery Conference.

This meeting was held in Marianna, Fla., Sept. 6th. In the absence of a Bishop, and in consequence of the feeble health of L. C. R. Wiggins, P. E., Rev. S. F. Pilley was requested to preside. The entire District was represented, except Milton; though the attendance was small, only 35 was present. The usual committees were appointed, and information relative to the various interests of the church, elicited. The reports of committees were brief, comprehensive and appropriate. The committee on spiritual condition of the church, found much for which to be grateful. Some genuine and deep seated revivals have been witnessed, and many souls have been converted to God. From most of the works, however, there were discouraging features reported. Great inactivity and moral apathy prevail. A zeal for other things has consumed that for the house of God. There is a great want of harmonious co-working, by that which every joint supplieth according to the effectual working in the measure of every part. Proper indoctrination and the enforcement of our general rules are deemed of vital importance, just now. Forty-six Sunday Schools were reported in successful operation. This interest was specially inquired into, and much found to be done for its promotion. It is sincerely regretted that we have been unable to meet the crying demand for books, and appliances to establish schools in every part of the District. The successful planting of the Christian church, in many portions of the territory is emphatically dependent upon the intellectual and religious culture of the children, through the instrumentality of Sunday Schools. The meeting approved the organization of a Sunday School association in this District, the object of which, is to supervise, and in every way practicable, promote the interests of the Sunday School cause. The question of missions and missionary territory, was prominently before the body. Never before has there been a more urgent demand for the gospel in this country than now. Quite a large area of territory is wholly unoccupied, and invites the sower with promise of an abundant harvest. Several new missions were recommended, old ones remodeled, and boundaries prescribed. No field for missionary enterprise has a greater claim upon the missionary funds of the Montgomery Conference, than this. The report on church extension or contraction (?) looked to the formation of such pastoral charges as would secure Saturday and Sabbath preaching to all the congregations, and the proper discharge of the functions of a pastor. After much discussion, the report was tabled on accounts of its radical proclivities. The financial status of the District is truly embarrassing. Several of the ministers have experienced the necessity of giving their attention to "serving tables." The assessment plan was adopted for future use, and special measures recommended to relieve the "present distress." A local preachers' association was authorized, and a committee appointed to report the modus operandi. Rev. J. Wood, P. C. Peacock, O. P. Faunt, and James McKinney, were elected delegates to the Annual Conference, and J. T. Russ, J. Carmichael, J. H. Porscher, and Amos Hays, alternates. The next meeting of the District, will be at Newton, Ala. It was specially insisted that we be favored with an episcopal presidency at that meeting. The usual gratulatory resolutions, and others, for presentation at the Annual Conference, were passed. It was resolved, That our Advocates are our most efficient helpers in the defence of our polity, and in spreading scripture doctrine and holiness in the lands, and that we earnestly seek the circulation of the New Orleans and Nashville Advocates, and of the Sunday School Visitor, requesting the Editors to inquire into the causes of their irregular arrivals.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

THE GLORIOUS WORK.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE—TALLASSEE CIRCUIT.

Dear Brother: The good Lord has most gloriously revived the noble work of saving souls once more upon the Tallassee Circuit. Since the 17th day of August, we have had one hundred and sixteen conversions, and of that number ninety-two have connected themselves with the army of Methodists who are fighting for Christ and his cause, in this portion of the field of conquest. The most of our young soldiers have entered fully into battle, and we are looking forward to the time, when some of them, at least, will become very efficient warriors for the "King of kings, and Lord of lords." Our fourth Quarterly Meeting was held at Chincy Grove, 14th and 15th of September, and was attended with one of the most glorious revivals that I have witnessed in several years. Bro. C. D. Oliver, from Wetumpka, preached the introductory sermon, on Saturday, 11 o'clock, which sermon was highly appreciated, and was blest to the accomplishment of good. Bro. D. M. Hudson, our much loved Presiding Elder, preached Saturday night, with power to the awakening of sinners, and to the comfort of the Church. And, again on Sunday at eleven o'clock, (after a very interesting Love-Fest,) he preached a sermon that did great good for the cause of Christ in that vicinity. And with zeal and success, labored he with us until Tuesday, when he had to leave us for other work. Our meeting continued with much interest until the forenoon of the 21st, at which time I had the pleasure of taking into the church, in full connection twenty-five, and three candidates for membership. One man fifty six years old was converted. Another sixty-eight was a penitent. The church at Chincy Grove was not only strengthened in number, but in faith also. Enough to say in conclusion, my dear brother, "The Lord has done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

Your Bro. in Christ, ROBERT A. TIMMONS.
Tallassee, Ala., Oct. 5, 1867.

Montgomery Conf.—Ashville Circuit.
Mr. Editor:—My friend—Rev. Jesse Collins, of the Baptist Church, and myself, commenced a series of meetings in Ashville, 12th August, and continued 11 days. There were 15 or 20 conversions, and several reclamations. The Lord greatly revived his people. An old man of 70 summers was converted. Why is it, that so many persons in the eve of life, have been led to Christ this year! I have heard of several very aged men and women accepting salvation in this circuit. It must be, that the Spirit operates upon the consciences and hearts of the people, with unusual power, and the word is preached more faithfully. I also held several days services for the colored congregation; resulting in eight conversions, and five accessions to the M. E. Church, South. There were seven members in the beginning of the year, now there are more than twenty.

Our cold climate Methodists here, have made repeated efforts to get them to unite with the M. E. Church, offering great inducements—money, church-houses, school-houses, lands, and free gospel. The members say, that they prefer remaining in our Church, and they will have to offer greater inducements, before they leave us. They are going to build a house of worship soon.

I held a meeting at Gainesville, commencing 14th September, ending 21st; resulting in 12 conversions, and 5 accessions. We preached in Bro. Gaines, house, for 2 days, when we concluded to hold services in a pleasant grove near by—a place was cleared off, seats were arranged, and five stands erected. (Army style.) We received many precious showers of divine grace, from the Lord's presence. We had certainly, some of the ancient fire, which spread over Satan's territory, in those mountains and valleys, with great rapidity, until he was burned out of house and home. The grand old forest resounded with groans of penitents, and shouts of heaven born souls. Men were interested, who were never seen before, at the house of God. Frequently, we could not preach, because of the cries of penitents for mercy, near the congregation.

On the next day (21st,) we rode 10 miles to McCauley's, where there was a previous appointment for several days meeting. I soon learned that the kind people of the neighborhood, had erected a more suitable house to worship in, than the one used for that purpose previously. The interest manifested was deep from first to last; attendance was large, attention good.

Twenty-three were happily converted; fifteen were added to the Church, and the people of God greatly blessed. Rev. Mr. Oldham, of the Presbyterian Church, preached frequently to the pleasure and edification of those present; also Rev. Enoch Ellis and A. W. Stevenson, local brethren of the circuit, labored faithfully and efficiently. In the beginning of the year, that society was about 15 in number, now it numbers 35, with a fair prospect of an increase. Our last Quarterly Meeting was held at Oak Grove, 5th Sunday and Saturday. Our beloved P. E., Rev. Theophilus Moody, a veteran of the cross, was unable in consequence of sickness, to labor in the pulpit, to the regret of all present. He has been a faithful servant of God, for about 40 years, laboring from year to year. He is a good practical, Holy Ghost preacher. He is the right man in the right place.

Many of those persons who left our communion, and joined missionaries of the M. E. Church North, are speaking of returning to their proper places, in the M. E. Church South. If they return home, we will give them the right hand of fellowship. We are of the opinion that this disturbance in our midst, among our societies has done good, and to-day, we verily believe, that Methodism is stronger than it has been for several years, in every respect. May God prosper His cause.

Yours in Christ,
R. E. CARR.
Ashville, Sept. 30th, 1867.

JACKSON CIRCUIT, MOBILE CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor:—Permit me to say to the brethren, through your columns; that the Lord has recently favored us with two revivals on this circuit. Assisted by Bro. Wimbish, (a local preacher) we held a meeting at Grove Hill, commencing Saturday, before the fourth Sunday in September, and ending the following Thursday night.

The weather was unfavorable most of the time, yet the congregation were large, and especially at night the house was crowded to overflowing. The altar was filled with mourners almost from the beginning, and many we trust were converted, we had no shouting, tears of joy as well as grief, were seen stealing down the cheeks many; and a deep religious fervor pervaded the congregation during every service. On Sabbath afternoon, ten colored persons presented themselves as candidates for church membership, and the last night of the meeting, we received into church, according to our tally, twelve white persons, six of whom were baptized. The interest of meeting continued to the end, very last appeal we made for tents, twenty or twenty-five to the altar, and with this number lingering there, we, for the week, ministerial assistance, were compelled to close the meeting.

The decline for sometime, but odium began to hold up her head there again, and we hope and that there is a bright day ahead.

We also had a revival at Zion, a little church in the country a few days ago. The members were greatly revived and blessed. Backsliders reclaimed, and five added with the church.

NEWS FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

On Sunday, Sept. 8th, says Christian Advocate, the Rev. J. Bangs, now seventy seven years of age and filling his fifty third annual year, preached three sermons, at the Tallassee Circuit, Tallassee, Georgia, on the subject of the Lord's Supper to a large congregation.

On one Quarterly Conference, rode nine miles between Tallassee and on Monday morning was at the Preacher's Meeting, where he was pleasantly assured as to the close, as vigorous in body and happy in spirit as any of the young preachers present. While on way, on Saturday morning, New Haven to his appointment his District, he was robbed of watch and purse while sleeping his berth in the steamer; but thief was unable to take with him the vest and cheerfulness to our friend in performing Sabbath service above Indian River. Bangs is enjoying an old age.

A HEBREW GOVERNMENT.—A government was established in 1864 by the Israelites residing in the United States for the purpose of guarding the race in America. The organization has been in operation ever since its establishment, but so exclusively have been confined to the Jews and circles of those immediately interested, that the public at large has known very little of its existence. The business of this government has now grown so important that the Executive is about to issue loans and issue bonds in the name of Israelitish government, bearing seven per cent interest. This organization is intended to operate with similar associations in other parts of the world, the object being a furtherance of favorite and traditional Jewish tenets, that the whole race of Israelites be ultimately gathered together to the land of their forefathers.

They believe, the temple of Jerusalem will be rebuilt, preparatory to the coming of the Messiah, to vindicate the truth of the religious beliefs which the Jews have adhered to for so many centuries. The whole number of Jews scattered abroad throughout the world is estimated at six millions.—New York Sun.

The irrepressible Tyng is in hot water, and this in Bishop Potter's Diocese. He evidently thought the gospel ought to be preached to the horseradish of Saratoga. Carons cannot be a true preacher silent. We can see what can save the High-Churchmen from ignominy if they do not prosecute the rebel.—Church Union.

On Sunday at the First Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Rev. George Duffield, the pastor, preached in the morning service; his son, George Duffield, of Galesburg, in the afternoon; and his grand-son, Rev. Samuel W. Duffield, of Philadelphia, in the evening. The father of the venerable Doctor was gathered at Detroit to celebrate golden wedding.

EVENING BRINGS US HOME.

On the hills the wind is sharp and cold,
The young grasses wither on the fold; O Lord, have wandered from Thy fold;
But evening brings us home.

The mists we stumble, and the rocks
The brown lichen whitens, and the fox The stragglers from the scattered flocks;
But evening brings us home.

Sharp thorns prick us, and our tender feet Are cut and bleeding, and the lamps repeat The painful complaints—O rest is sweet When evening brings us home.

Have been wounded by the hunter's darts, The arrows are very heavy, and our hearts Are sore for thy coming—when the light departs And evening brings us home.

Through the gloom no
To guide us. We have wandered far; Thy lamp we know not where we are—At evening, brings us home.

At evening, bring us home.

THE CONTENTS OF MEMORY.

From the "contents" of memory To its "imperishableness," The illustrations are most interesting, but to me they possess this special charm, that they are, with one or two exceptions, the passages referred to in the preface—quotations, by which the estimated professor commended to students the view, that memory might be the judgement-book.
The italicized sentence of first impression the germ of that view will be found:—

"A young woman of four or five and twenty, who could neither read nor write, was seized with a fever, during which, according to the asseverations of all the priests and monks of the neighborhood, she became possessed, and, as it appeared, by a very terrible devil. She continued incessantly talking Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, in very pompous tones, and with most distinct pronunciation. . . . The case had attracted the particular attention of a young physician, and by his element many eminent physiologists and psychologists visited the spot. Sheets full of her sayings were taken down from her mouth, and were found to consist of sentences, coherent and intelligible each for itself, but with little or no connection with each other. Of the Hebrew, a small portion only could be traced to the Bible; the remainder appeared to be in the Rabbinical dialect. All trick or conspiracy was of the question. Not only had the young woman ever been a simple, simple creature, but she was evidently laboring under a fever. In the town in which she had been resident for many years as a servant in different families, no solution presented itself. The young physician, however, determined to trace her past step by step; for the patient herself was incapable of returning rational answer. He at length succeeded in discovering, . . . that the patient—an orphan at the time—had been charitably taken up by an old Protestant pastor at some years of age, and had remained with him some years, even till the old man's death. . . . Anxious inquiries were then, of course, made concerning the pastor's habits; and the solution of the phenomenon was soon obtained, for it appeared that it had been the old man's custom for years to walk up and down the passage of his house, into which the kitchen door opened, and to repeat to himself a loud voice out of his favorite books. . . . He was a very learned man, and a great Hebra-ist. Among his books (discovered in a niece's possession) were found a collection of Rabbinical writings, together with several of the Greek and Latin fathers; and the physician succeeded in identifying so many passages with those taken down at the young woman's bedside, that no doubt could remain in any rational mind concerning the true origin of the impression made on her nervous system. This authenticated case furnishes both proof and instance, that relics of sensation may exist, for an indefinite time in a latent state, in the very same order in which they were originally impressed; and as we cannot rationally suppose the feverish state of the brain to act in any other way than as a stimulus, this fact (and it would not be difficult to adduce several of the same kind) contributes to make it even probable, that all thoughts are in themselves imperishable; and that if the intelligent faculty should be resolved more comprehensive, it would require only a different and appropriated organization—the body celestial instead of the body terrestrial—to bring before every human soul the collective experience of its whole past existence.

And this—this—perchance is the dread hook of judgment, in the mysterious hieroglyphics of which every idle word is recorded. Yea, in the very nature of a living spirit, it may be more possible, that heaven and earth should pass away, than that a single act, a single thought, should be loosened or lost from that living chain of causes, with all the links of which conscious or unconscious, the free will, our only absolute self, is co-extensive and co-present."—COL-LIER: "Biographical Literature,"

After the death of Professor John Wilson, Mr. Warren published an account of an interview he once had with the Professor, when Mr.
De Quincy was present, and the conversation happened to turn on "forgetting."

"Is such a thing as forgetting possible to the human mind?" asked Mr. De Quincy. "Does the mind ever actually lose anything for ever? Is not every impression it has once received reproducible? How often a thing is suddenly recollected that had happened many, many years before, but never been thought of since till that moment! Possibly a suddenly-developed power of recollecting every act of a man's life, may constitute the great book to be opened before him on the judgment day." I ventured to say, that I knew an instance of a gentleman who, in hastily jumping on board the Excellent, . . . missed it, and fell into the water of Portsmouth harbor, sinking to a great depth. He afterwards said, that all he remembered, after plunging into the water, was a sense of freedom from pain, and a sudden recollection of all his past life, especially of guilty actions that he had long forgotten. Professor Wilson said, that if this were so, it was indeed very startling; and I think Mr. De Quincy said, that he had also heard of one, if not two or three such cases.—"Personal Recollections of Christopher North," Blackwood's Magazine, December 1851.

This extract from Blackwood's Magazine may serve as an appropriate introduction to a passage from Mr. De Quincy's own writings—a passage which cannot fail to suggest what the subject which those quotations are intended to illustrate might have become in the hands of a master. It is from his well-known description of the Palimpsest of the Brain:

"The fleeting accidents of man's life, and its external shows, may indeed be irrelative and incongruous; but the organizing principles which fuse into harmony, and gather about fixed predetermined centres, whatever heterogeneous elements life may have accumulated from without, will not permit the grandeur of human unity greatly to be violated, or its ultimate repose to be troubled in the retrospect from dying moments, or from other great convulsions.
Such a convulsion is the struggle of gradual suffocation, as in drowning; and in the original Optima-Confessions, I mentioned a case of that nature communicated to me by a lady from her own childish experience. The lady is still living; and at the time of relating this incident, when already very old, she had become religious to skepticism. According to my present belief, she had completed her ninth year, when, playing by the side of a solitary brook, she fell into one of its deepest pools.
Eventually, but after what lapse of time nobody ever knew, she was saved from death by a farmer, who riding in some distant lane, had seen her rise to the surface; but not until she had descended within the abyss of death, and looked into its secrets, as far, perhaps, as ever human eye can have looked that can have permission to return. At a certain stage of this descent a blow seemed to strike her—phosphoric radiance sprang forth from her eyeballs; and immediately a mighty theatre expanded within her brain. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, every act, every design of her past life, lived again—arraying themselves, not as a succession, but as parts of a co-existence.
Such a light fell upon the whole path of her life backwards into the shades of infancy, as the light, perhaps, which rapt the destined apostle on his road to Damascus.
Yet that light blinded for a se-son; but her's poured celestial vision upon the brain, so that her consciousness became omnipresent at one moment to every feature in the infinite review. This anecdote was treated sceptically at the time by some critics. But, besides that it has since been confirmed by other experience essentially the same, reported by other parties in the same circumstances, who had never heard of each other, the true point for astonishment is not the stuntness of arrangement under which the past events of life—though in fact successive —had formed their dread line of revelation. This was but a secondary phenomenon; the deeper lay in the resurrection itself, and the possibility of resurrection for what had so long slept in the dust. A pall, deep as oblivion, had been thrown by life over every trace of these experiences; and yet suddenly, at a silent command, at the signal of a blazing rocket sent up from the brain, the pall draws up, and the whole depths of the theatre are exposed. Here was the greater mystery. Now this mystery is liable to no doubt; for it is repeated, and ten thousand times repeated, by opium, for those who are its martyrs. Yes, reader, confess, are the mysterious handwritings of grief or joy which have inscribed themselves success-ively upon the palimpsest of your brain; and like the animal leaves of aboriginal forests, or the undissolving snows on the Himalaya, or light falling upon light, the endless strata have covered up each other in forgetfulness. But by the hour of death, but by fever, but by the scorplings of opium, all these can revive in strength. They are not dead, but sleeping."

The case of drowning in Portsmouth harbor, referred to in the conversation of Professor Wilson's, is familiar enough to students of mental philosophy, but I give it here for the sake of the general reader. Apart from its value as an illustration of the imperishableness of thought, it is intrinsically worth repeating. The writer was Admiral Beaufort, and the narrative was drawn up (in 1825) at the request of Dr. Wollaston, to whom the substance of it had been communicated orally some time before. After giving the details of the falling into the water, and the preparations for resending him, the narrator states:—

"With the violent but vain attempts to make myself heard, I had swallowed much water; I was soon exhausted by my struggles, and before any relief reached me I had sunk below the surface: all hope had fled—all exertion ceased —and I felt I was drowning. So far, these facts were either partially remembered after my recovery, or supplied by those who had latterly witnessed the scene; for during an interval of such agitation a drowning person is too much occupied in catching at every passing straw, or too much absorbed by alternate hope and despair, to mark the succession of events very accurately."

"Not so, however, with the facts which immediately ensued: my mind had then undergone the sudden revolution which appeared to you so remarkable, and all the circumstances of which are now as vividly fresh in my memory as if they had occurred but yesterday.
From the moment that all exertion had ceased, which I imagine was the immediate consequence of complete suffocation, a calm feeling of the most perfect tranquillity superseeded the previous tumultuous sensations. It might be called apathy, certainly not resignation, for drowning no longer appeared to be an evil. I no longer thought of being rescued, nor was I in any bodily pain. On the contrary, my sensations were now of rather a pleasurable cast, partaking of that dull but contented sort of feeling which precedes the sleep produced by fatigue. Though the senses were thus deadened, not so the mind: its activity seemed to be invigorated, in a ratio which defies all description; for thought rose after thought with a rapidity of succession that is not only indescribable, but probably inconceivable by any one who has not himself been in a similar situation.
The course of those thoughts I can even now in a great measure retrace: the event which had just taken place—the awkwardness that had produced it—the bustle it must have occasioned (for I had deserved two persons jump from the chains)—the effect it would have on a most affectionate father —the manner in which he would disclose it to the rest of the family—and a thousand other circumstances minutely associated with home, were the first series of reflections that occurred. They then took a wider range: our last cruise—a former voyage and shipwreck—my school—the progress I had made there, and the time I had mispent—and even all my boyish pursuits and adventures."

"Thus traveling backwards, every past incident of my life seemed to glance across my recollection in retrograde succession; not, however, in mere outline, as here stated, but the picture filled up with every minute and collateral feature: in short, the whole period of my existence seemed to be placed before me in a kind of panoramic review, and each act of it seemed to be accompanied by a consciousness of right or wrong, or by some reflection on its cause or its consequences; indeed, many trilling events which had been long forgotten then crowded into my imagination, and with the character of recent familiarity."

"May not all this be some of the almost infinite power of memory with which we may awaken in another world, and thus be compelled to contemplate our past lives? Or might it not in some degree warrant the inference that death is only a change or modification of our existence, in which there is no real pause or interruption? But, however that may be, one circumstance was highly remarkable, that the innumerable ideas which flashed into my mind were all retrospective. Yet I had been religiously brought up: my hopes and fears of the next world had lost nothing of their early strength, and at any other period intense interest and awful anxiety would have been excited by the mere probability that I was floating on the threshold of eternity; yet, at that inexplicable moment, when I had a full conviction that I had already crossed that threshold, not a single thought wandered into the future: I was wrapt entirely in the past."

"The length of time that was occupied by this deluge of ideas, or rather the shortness of time into which they were condensed, I cannot now state with precision; yet certainly two minutes could not have elapsed from the moment of suffocation to that of my being hauled up."—Letter from Admiral Beaufort to Dr. Wollaston, in Sir J. Barrow's Autobiography, pp.
398—401.

BAPTIST.

MR. SPURGEON'S NEW BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.

On Monday, September 9th, the first stones of three of the houses for fatherless boys, which are about to be erected at Stockwell, under the direction of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, were laid in the presence of a large assemblage of the members of his congregation and their friends. About twelve months ago a benevolent lady, Mrs. Ann Hill-yard, whose name was for the first time made public on Monday, placed at the disposal of Mr. Spurgeon a sum of £20,000 to be applied to the maintenance of orphan boys, "with a special view to their godly education," in the hope that they might in future years become ministers and missionaries. In order to carry out her intentions, trustees have been appointed, and they have procured a piece of land at Stockwell, about two and a half acres in extent, upon which they propose to erect a number of houses, each capable of accommodating from eighteen to twenty boys, as well as a large school room, and a dining room, to be used in common by all the inmates. The money given by Mrs.
Hillyard is so invested that it cannot at present be realized without loss. The trustees, therefore, propose to retain this sum as the permanent endowment of the Orphanage, adding to it from time to time; and for the erection of the houses and other necessary buildings they design to rely upon the contributions of their friends. The cost of the three houses, of which the first stones were laid on Monday, has already been provided for; one is the gift of a lady to celebrate her "silver wedding," another is to be paid for by a merchant of the city of London, and the third will be erected at the charge of the workmen of Mr. Higgs, the builder.
Soon after the proceedings were commenced on Monday, and while Mr. Spurgeon was addressing the crowd, the roof of a slight shed upon which some dozen or two of spectators had taken up their position gave way, and its occupants appeared for a moment in danger of getting an ugly tumble. As soon as it appeared that no injury had been sustained by any one, Mr.
Spurgeon informed his audience that no one was hurt, adding, "our friends were told not to get up there, they did not come down of their own will, and therefore Providence has arranged it," an assurance that was received with a good deal of laughter.

Rolling a Fifteen-inch Plate.

The London Times recently published the following interesting account of the rolling of a 15-inch plate at the famous works of Sir John Brown, in Sheffield:—

"The plate was not quite ready at the time appointed, and during the short interval of delay the works were inspected. It is almost impossible to describe the aspect of Cyclopean activity which they presented. The huge space of lofty workshops, covering more than 23 acres of ground, were, above, all dim with smoke; below, all dazzling with the blinding glare and heat of furnaces. Everywhere ponderous flywheels, were spinning round with a loud hum through the gloom; everywhere steam-hammers were falling with a shock upon the solid earth that made the walls vibrate, and people near them jump under the tremendous concussion.
No place seemed free from steam or flame or melted iron. The dark nooks would suddenly become bright as furnace-doors were lifted and emitted their long light-looking flames of dazzling white vapor, and disgorge a mass of seething metal which men, almost clad in light steel armor, wheeled away and shot under the steam hammers, the first stroke of which sent jets of melted iron rushing in trains of fire-like meteors in all directions. Sometimes one came on groups of men who were saturating in water the rough baads of sacking in which they were enveloped before going to wrestle with some white-hot forging, sometimes on men nearly naked, with the perspiration pouring from them, who had come to rest for a moment from the puddling furnaces, and to take a long drink of the thick oatmeal and water which is all they venture on during their labor, and which long experience has proved to be the most sustaining of all drinks under the tremendous heat to which they are subjected. On every side the glare, the smoke, the din, and the steam are alike deafening and blinding. On every side are masses of molten iron running down troughs; or great blocks of it, heated to a glow that is almost melting, being welded and knocked away in myriads of sparks and jets of refuse under the blows of the hammers.
Most uncomfortable of all are the slabs of armor-plate and blocks of steel ingots which, half cooled and of a dull slate color, lie about everywhere. From those in a brighter glow the visitor can guard himself, for he sees them; but from those which are partly cooled, but yet hot enough to scorch the flesh from the bones when closely approached, there is little safeguard, as one hurries out of the way of seething puddle-blooms or open furnaces, which diffuse such an intense general heat around that little extra warning is given by the treacherous mass of half-cooled slabs till the danger is almost too near to be avoided. After seeing and suffering under seeing such scenes, the visitors were conducted to the armor rolling-mill, where the monster plate was to be drawn.
The process of drawing it is simple, but peculiar. The plate, when laid in the furnace, rests upon little stacks of fire-bricks, so that the flame and heat plays equally round it till all is glowing white, and the successive layers have settled down into one dense mass. A great deal of the success depends upon the time at which the plate is drawn, and the amount and length of time to which it is to be heated. All this is regulated by the chief roller and chief furnace-man, who are paid wages which many eminent professional men might envy—wages amounting from £1,200 to sometimes £2,000 a year. On Friday, as the time for "drawing" approached, these officials opened the furnace doors, and, approaching close in them with only the shelter of a lump of wet rag held loosely before their arms and faces, peered into the blinding glare from time to time with as much care and apparently as much indifference as if they were looking into the tube of a telescope. Suddenly, at a signal from the furnace-man, the bands of workmen, to the number of about sixty, arranged themselves on each side of the furnace, as near to it as they could bear the heat. Then the doors were opened to their fullest, and what had been a glare before and what had been a heat were quite eclipsed by the intense light and ferocity with which the long tongues of flame leapt forth. In the midst of this great light lay a mass even whiter than the rest. To this some half-dozen men drew near. They were all attired in thin steel leggings, aprons of steel, and a thin curtain of steel wirework dropping over their faces like a large, long visor. All the rest of their bodies was muffled in thick wet sacking. Thus protected they marched, with the aid of a giant pair of forceps slung from a crane above, to work, as it were, amid the flames for a few seconds, and to nip the huge plate with the signal was then given, and the whole mass of iron, giving out sparks and shooting out jets of lambent flame, was by the main force of chains attached to the steam rollers drawn forth from the furnace, on to a long wrought-iron car. The heat and light which it then diffused were almost unbearable in any part of the huge mill, but the men seemed to vie with each other to approach and detach the colossal pinchers which had drawn the iron forth. More than a dozen attempts were made on Friday before this was effected, and more than a dozen of the best and most skillful workmen were driven back, one after another, by the tremendous heat and glare. At last all was made clear. The forceps, then red-hot from their grip of the plate, were drawn away, the chains chared from the rollers, and, with a great hurrah, the other workmen seized the chains attached to the iron truck, and drew it to the incline by main force, where it was left by its own weight to run into the jaws of the rolling-mill. It was saucy qui part among the workmen, who rushed for shelter in all directions as the mass was nipped between the rollers, and wound rapidly in amid quick reports like those of dull musketry, as the melted iron was squeezed by the tremendous pressure out of the mass, and flew out in jets of liquid fire on all sides.

In spite of all the care and all the skill which the best workmen can use on these occasions, they cannot always escape the splashes of melted iron, and the burns inflicted are numerous and often severe. The turning of the rollers, crushes the plate through to the other side, where it rests for a minute on a wrought-iron truck similar to that on which it was brought from the furnace. The action of the rollers is then reversed after they have been by the action of screw levers brought closer together by about an inch. These again nip the plate and drag it back in an opposite direction, and again and again does the mass go forward and backward, each time passing between a smaller space between the rollers, till, as on Friday, the whole of the huge thickness was reduced to a compact mass 15 inches thick, in-less than a quarter of an hour.
During every stage of the process, quantities of fine sand are thrown upon the plate, and this literally takes fire as it touches the flaming surface, and covers it as it melts with a coat of silica, or with a glaze like that of earthenware. After every discharge of sand, and these go on almost incessantly, buckets of water are thrown upon the plate and explode in clouds of scalding steam, and when these are partly dissipated, men rush forward, and with wet brooms with handles 20 feet long sweep of whatever little scraps of oxidation may have taken place. Thus, every time the plate passes through the mill the sand is scattered, the water thrown, and the surface swept, and at every roll the chief roller of the establishment runs forward, and, under the shelter of wet cloths, measures with a gauge its thickness from end to end.
On Friday the required dimensions were obtained, as we have said, by less than a quarter of an hour's rolling, and a plate 15 inches thick, the product of the labor of nearly 200 men and of the consumption of nearly 250 tons of coal, was shot out by the rolling-mills and left to cool. When this had been effected, two large rollers of iron, each weighing 15 tons, were placed upon it by the cranes, and moved slowly backwards and forwards, and, eventually, as the plate cooled, were left upon its ends to keep the whole perfectly level. Nothing further now remained in order to complete it as the finest specimen of armor-plate manufacture ever attempted but to plane off its rough ends and edges. The flat surfaces on either side, which form what is called the skin of the plate, are never interfered with, for the action of the steel rollers leaves them lit-

WHY THE SKY IS BLUE.—It is generally supposed that the blue color of the sky is due to moisture in the atmosphere, and the idea seems to be confirmed by the intensity of the color during the moist weather of summer, when compared with the sky of the more dry weather of winter. It has recently been shown by Prof. Cooke, of Cambridge, in a paper read to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, that this view is correct. He has found, by means of the spectroscopic, a very delicate instrument of analysis, by which the moist minute substances, even when at a distance, can be detected, that the aqueous vapor of the atmosphere absorbs most powerfully the yellow and red rays to be transmitted, and thus accounting for the color of the sky. The instrument also proves that the color is due to simple absorption of these rays by the water, and not to reflected reflections from the surface of an infinity of drops; as has been

To Subscribers.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO OUR AGENTS.

In making changes please state the place from which, as well as the place to which the change is made. We are very desirous that our subscription list should be doubled between this and the meeting of our own patronizing Conferences. Planters will have money on hand early this year if at all, so that now is the most favorable time to secure subscribers. As they have no longer any temptation to invest their incomes in either land or negroes, they can easily be persuaded to take a paper. Try it. Every good man should have in his house a paper bringing the weekly statement of the work of God among the Churches. He should read the precious record of the death of holy men and women, whose final triumph strengthens our hopes, and subdues our passions. Every one given to thinking and forecasting, will need much light to keep up with the astounding events which are shaping hourly the fortunes of the Southern people. The Advocate will furnish some contribution towards supplying these wants.

NOTICE.

On the 26th of November, at 5 o'clock P. M., in Carondelet street Church, in this city, will be held a MEETING OF THE DISTRICT STEWARDS, for the purpose of electing four Lay Delegates to the Louisiana Conference—as provided by the District Meeting of this District.

Natchez, Miss., Oct. 7th 1867.

The Presiding Elders of the Mississippi Conference, will do me a favor, by reporting to me the names of the delegates to the next Annual Conference, elected by their District Meetings. A copy of the minutes of the last Conference, would be very serviceable to me, in providing for the accommodation of the preachers, as I neither know their names, or number. I shall regard it as a favor to receive a copy from any one.

W. E. M. LINFIELD.

God has had on earth one Son without sin, but never one without afflictions. The road to heaven is soaking with the blood of fifty millions of martyrs. Rivers of water ran down their eyes. Yet they all, even when on earth, regarded sin as the worst evil in the universe. Oh! avoid the very appearance of evil. God has a right to expect that you will now honor him. Do it, and he will honor you. But if you now sin against him, you shall be lightly esteemed.

THE DUTY OF LIVING.

Few men in their senses are willing to take the responsibilities of deliberate suicide. There are many—more than is ordinarily supposed—who would choose to die, rather than live. The troubles of life go very far towards reconciling people to death. The grave to many is less dark and repulsive than life.

The Christian's apprehension of the subject may be defective. The natural instinct which is strong in brutes as well as in men, leads us to cling to life. The objects of affection and dependence strengthen our hold upon it. The instinctive love of life, and the ties of natural affection, constitute usually the main incentives of living. To leave a dependent family, seems to be the uttermost of death's calamity. Where the natural desire of life is overcome, by the vanities and failures of it, and where life does not appear essential to the maintenance and happiness of kindred, there would seem to be no adequate motive of continued struggle here.

It happens, with these inadequate views, that life is held very cheap. Readiness to die is judged by the state of reconciliation with God, by the absence of any fear of death, and by those longings after immortality, which are intensified by present sufferings. To depart and be with Christ is far better doubtless, but does the work of God, come in as the real and potent reconciling tie to life? We would ask as many thoughtful Christians as may read these lines, whether in their reflections upon their own living and dying, this highest and truest of all motives has entered much into the account? In view of the probability of departure from earth, has not the chief and only concern been about wife and children, and unsettled temporal affairs? These interests lie near to the hearts of all, and they are not only natural, but right. If there not something wrong, however, when these are the only concerns, and when the service of God is left out of our valuation of life? Many insure their lives, for the sake of their families and their creditors; but we have never heard of anyone insuring his life for the support of the gospel, or the extension of Christian missions. Such instances may be, but we are not able to recall them.

The highest value of the Christian's life is in its relations to our Father's business. To live is Christ, and living unto the Lord is the real converse of living unto self. To live for wife and children, merely on chief, is an elongated selfishness. To live simply in obedience to natural instinct, is brutish. The duty of living grows out of a higher conception of life, as the talent to be improved for Christ's honor, and the furtherance of his spiritual Kingdom. The Christian with his readiness for death, and his longings for heaven, is bound to earth by this strongest of all ties. Beyond those other considerations which are common to all, he values his life for what it may be worth to the cause of religion, and the general good that he may do. It may happen that he is called sometimes to take his life in his own hands, and to choose between a present martyrdom and a prolonged life of devoted toil. The point is determined by, which is likely to accomplish most for God?

Life becomes a high religious duty in this aspect of the subject, not only in the sense of working while we live, but as it is a duty to live. The idle servant is guilty of moral suicide, but the reckless servant is not less to be condemned. It is a Christian duty to live and to live long. It is better, neither to wear out nor rust out, but so to husband, and distribute the strength as to secure the greatest longevity, and the longest usefulness.

The Scriptures certainly make long life a boon. To the worldling it appears so, but not less is it desirable to the Christian. The "good old age and full of years" is the exultant crowning of the Old Testament obituaries; and some of the promises hold out long life as the greatest blessing. Godliness is profitable, "having promise of the life which now is." Parents are to be honored, "that thy life may be long in the land," and a Psalm of promises concludes, "with long life will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation." It is the curse of the wicked that they "shall not live out half their days." If long life were not a thing to be desired, and upon the highest grounds, these Scriptures would be misleading, and contradictory.

To the good man long life is desirable on many accounts, but chiefly for the maturity and perfection of his usefulness in the militant Kingdom of Christ. Time is short, too short to do much in, it may be, but every year is of untold preciousness to the earnest worker in the vineyard. The elder years are also of increasing value, in which the accumulated capital of wisdom, knowledge and piety, is expended upon fresh and larger enterprises. Generally, people look for retirement, just where their capacity for greatest usefulness begins. To expect early retirement from active and devoted labors in religion, and to count upon an early death, are much the same thing. To live long and to labor long is the duty to be set before us. Long life is a blessing to us, that we may attend to the nurture and care of our families, and see our children settled in their chosen pursuits. But it is a blessing for another and better reason, that it affords the completest and fullest scope for the accomplishment of the greatest good.

Nor ought any under estimate of our powers and opportunities to be allowed to break the force of this motive. The most inferior talents, amidst the most unfavorable circumstances, will accomplish a great deal, if they have time to work in. Every life is important to God and to his work; and every life has a mission which is essential to the cause of Christ. You may think it matters little when you die, or how long you live. But if you feel that you have something to do, and a part to contribute to the great evangelical whole, it matters much. It behooves you to live, to live to be old, and lay the completest offering possible upon the altar. Our old Christians are precious to the church; and our aged ministers, full of years and labors, how could we do without them? These gray headed men and women in our congregations and our Church meetings, are now doing their greatest and best work. To the believer there is a blessing in living as well as in dying, and we think that too much stress cannot be laid upon living, as a duty we are called upon to cherish.

There is a great deal of unwholesome cant about the vanity of life, and the blessedness of death. In God's order and providence, death is a blessing at any time to the good; and we are grateful for the light which providence and immortality shed upon the problem of early dissolution. But, for all this, there is a beauty and love and godliness here; and beyond the material and social aspects, living, and living long, assumes the character of a sublime and sacred duty. It cannot be a matter of indifference to the believer whether he lives or dies. If instinct were gone, and social ties were all severed, and the way to heaven unclouded, his Christian work and mission would suffice to make life valuable and to be retained to the latest hour.

Dr. ROBERT C. HILLIARD.

The death of this influential and valuable citizen occurred on Sept. 10, in New Iberia. He died in the heroic discharge of his professional duties. He was unremitting in his labors, and waited upon strangers, and his own family until, overcome with fatigue, he fell a victim to the yellow fever. He was baptized during his last sickness, by the Rev. A. E. Goodwyn, who writes: "He made all the answers with emphasis." So pass away our friends one by one, as the stars set, and go on to other climes.

THE RE-ACTION.

The change of public sentiment at the North, indicated in the Pennsylvania and Ohio elections, is as cheering to us as it was unexpected and sudden. We are disposed to set it down to the instinct of the masses rather than to any wisdom or guidance in their leaders. There was one notable exception. The President has steadily put upon the record his protest against the destructive and unconstitutional policy of the party in power. Of those actually holding place in the general Government, there are not in all more than two dozen men who united with him in opposing these destructive. His opposition has been the more marked, because it has not been marred by the exhibition of either revenge or covetousness. He has been satisfied to point out the enemies of the country who were in high position; while he has removed but one of them from office. Those who continued to draw support from the federal clerkships, were allowed to display on all occasions an active and bitter opposition to the Executive. He has on the other hand, put scarcely any of his personal or political friends in office, and has been proof against the various schemes which were adroitly arranged to fill his hands with patronage, and his coffers with gold. He returned a magnificent present of cash and horses, which the merchants of New York had quietly forwarded directly upon his inauguration to the office of the Chief Magistracy. The horses heads were turned back again, the coach went to the bammer, and the somewhat novel idea of an incorruptible honesty in public office, gleaned for an instant before the minds of those surprised patriotic subscribers. Like men really do who have learned something new and valuable, they kept the whole affair very much to themselves. This entire freedom from a vice which has become the characteristic of American office holders, and which has been brought to its present enormous perfection during the last six years, is a constant and insupportable offense to a body of men who have exhausted all the present resources of the government, and have anticipated those of a hundred years to come, in ministering to their own insatiable rapacity. Besides this, he has laid bare the wholesale robbery, which under the color of sober legislation, and pure patriotism, has in two years distributed bonanzas to soldiers, to the amount of four hundred and fifty millions of dollars. No wonder the Congress seeks to get rid of this inconvenient Executive, who maintains an honest record in the presence of boundless corruption.

The common people, we doubt not, have come to believe that the President is an honest man, and that in this respect he stands pretty much alone at Washington. They begin to heed his warnings because he has proved himself worthy of being heard. Whether the tardy and patient methods of Mr. Johnson has wrought conviction soon enough, remains to be seen. The gains of the Constitutional party in Ohio, and the "Keystone" State, do not arrest the operation of the Military Bill. The fate of the country is now already, ought we can see, in the hands of negro conventions, as ordered through a false and violent registration; that is, in the hands of extreme Radicals. If New York be added to Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and California, they will not, all told, send as many Senators to Congress, as the negroes of the South will send.

This Negro rule is a species of brute force, admirably adapted to the purposes of tyranny, having immense availability, and of easy control. The negro of the South, upon the pretext of a great principle, is used to successfully neutralize the vote of the Southern white citizen, and thus in effect, the control of all the Southern States, is permanently secured to the States of the North. Such is the plan; if it can be made to work. The only question is whether the negro can be made available for the purposes of government, and at the same time be used to cultivate sugar and cotton. Revenges has always been an expensive luxury; but never in the history of our race, has it cost a people so much as those of the North are now paying for its indulgence. To humiliate a rival they have sacrificed not only the Constitution of this country, the principle of self-government, of which they have ever vaunted themselves, but also the control of the greatest source of wealth, agricultural and commercial, ever as yet discovered, or held by any nation; in fact the custom of the world, and its marine supremacy. For a people given to trading, to destroy its only means of access to the marts of the world, and its monopoly of the one greatest product of tropical harvests, in order to indulge in the mania of revenge, is a display of human folly too great to be credited by any but those who have lived to witness it. Upon such folly bankruptcy and deep, widespread, universal waits. Haunted by its vision, the people, in advance, are visiting upon those who are the prime authors of it—the world bending fanatics, of the Garrison, Greeley and Beecher stamp—the first instalments of a swelling anathema. They see that their taxes are greater than those borne by any other people.

that their ships are rotting in port; that their iron mills and furnaces, if working at all, are driven by the force of an unexampled and short-lived protection; that the government, by accumulative tariffs is supporting the East at the expense of the West; that their children's children are to be the slaves of a debt which can never be paid; that there is but a step between them, and the hard condition of the European laborer; that for gold and silver, they have only paper; that the offices of public trust are filled with robbers; and that negroes are enfranchised to hold white men in subjection. These it seems to us, are the reasons which, without concert, are moving the Northern people to ward a reaction, and a change of policy swift and thorough, and beyond the check of the Radical Politicians, whether of church or State. The views of ex-President Franklin H. Pierce, confirm this opinion, he says:

"I warn you, my friends, to note the fact that these triumphs, whatever they may be, are no party triumphs. The people have risen in their majesty, with a consciousness of their power, and, disregarding party lines and party aspirations, have been silently considering what belongs to them, their children and their country. I think the great battle has been fought and won. If the results are significant in nothing else, they are in this: that the white race—our race—the German, Italian, French, Irish, Scotch and Anglo Saxon people—are still to be the controlling power on this continent."

THE NEGRO GRAND JURY.

A majority of the Grand Jury for the First District Court, of this State, consists of black men. By the subjoined item of the week's News, it will be seen that this eagerness of Northern folly and revenge, has been put in motion for the first time, in the history of our race. It is scarce necessary to add, that it is by the operation of military rule, and not of State laws, that this monstrous spectacle presents itself before the world. In this line, and populous City, one of the great ports of Christendom, the administration of justice has been placed in the hands, of African! a race justly accounted through all the past, as incapable of science, arts, literature, or government, because they have contributed nothing to either, during 6000 years. This is the revenge of a Christian people, in the nineteenth century, upon six millions of white people, in whose veins much of their own blood flows!

THE NEGRO GRAND JURY.

The negro Grand Jury of the parish were empanelled yesterday in the First District Court, Judge Thomas taking his seat and presiding in the absence of Judge Howe, military incumbent of the Bench. Three-fourths of the venire consisted of negroes, and the following jury were empanelled:

L. L. Bernard, foreman; Thomas Powers, Michael Finnegan, Abelard Duvalne, Theodore Crawford, James Battle, H. W. Norman, Peter Fishback. The above are white men. The following are negroes: Chas. Gray, Isaac Cummings, Cyprion Eveque, Charles A. Williams, Louis Smith, G. D. Giddes, John Rose, Barney Walker.

The jury being for red, Judge Thomas delivered the following charge:
"Mr. Foreman and Gentlemen of the Grand Jury.—The law has now called on you to perform duties with which many of you cannot be very familiar, inasmuch as you constitute the first Grand Jury ever drawn in this parish from all the people without regard to race or color. I am called on by the same law, as the acting judge of this court, to give you such instructions in regard to your duties as may be deemed necessary."

THE SOUTHERN REVIEW.

The October number of this Quarterly comes to hand richly freighted. The contents are Alexander Hamilton—Bertrand du Guesclin and his Times—Education of the Intellect—Baker's African Exploring Expedition—The North and the South in the Convention 1787—Mexico and Mexican Affairs—Limits of Culture—Canada and the United States—Chancellorsville—Book notices. Either of these articles will repay one the annual cost of this masterly work. It is not only Southern in its political affiliations, but in the thoroughness of its scholarship, and in the easy affluence of its discussions. The superficial, epigrammatic smartness which often passes for Review-writing finds no place in its pages. We were not only instructed, but mentally strengthened by the perusal of the articles on the Convention of 1787, and on the Limits of Culture. No one can form a correct estimate of the causes of the late war, who has not met with the facts and the history which are so ably discussed in the former article. It traces the great trouble to its fountain head. We see the exact rock which divided the opposing streams of Northern and Southern policies; and in another aspect of the word, the rocks upon which eventually all the country was shattered. After perusing this article, one does not wonder quite so much at the studious silence of Northern Magazines and Quarterlies, in regard to this publication. Well, its Editors can afford to wait; there is an audience of scholars and statesmen, outside of the corporation of Cape Cod, which will eventually recognize the mental vigor and high polish of this mouth-piece of Southern men. THE CHILD'S CORNER.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

Sing to the Lord the children's hymn:
His gentle love declare,
Who bends, amid the cherubim,
To hear the children's prayer.

He at a mother's breast was fed, Though God's own Son was he;
He learned the first small words he said At a meek mother's knee.

He held us to his mighty breast,
The children of the earth;
He lifted up his hands, and blessed The babes of human birth.

Although he is the Son of God, Our gracious Saviour too,
The scenes we tread his footsteps trod, The paths of youth he knew.

And from the stars his face will turn On us with glances mild;
The angels of his presence yearn To bless the little child.

Sing to the Lord the children's hymn:
His gentle love declare,
Who bends, amid the cherubim,
To hear the children's prayer.

WAITING.

"I am waiting for the influences of the Spirit," said a young man, in reply to his pastor's urgent request that he would attend without delay to his eternal interests.

"It is true, James, that you can do nothing to save yourself; that you are wholly dependent on these influences. But how are you waiting for them? If you were waiting for the arrival of a friend, you would be constantly looking for him; you would go to meet him; you would be anxious lest something should hinder his coming. Is it thus that you are waiting for his coming? Is it thus that you are waiting for the Spirit? In the sanctuary, where God's honor dwelleth, and where the Spirit often gives convincing and converting power to the word dispensed; in the meeting of prayer, of which the Saviour has said, 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them'; at the mercy-seat, in humble supplication for his coming, for he has made asking one of the conditions of receiving; and are you asking earnestly with the agonizing conviction that it is your only hope—asking with a full apprehension of the awful danger that the Spirit, grieved with your long delay, may at any moment take his everlasting flight?—is this the manner of your waiting? Or are you wholly engrossed with your business, or waiting, amid the gaieties and pleasures of the world, with no fear that the Spirit will stay away and leave you to hardness of heart, and blindness of mind? Ah! my friend, the Spirit now waits for you; is offering you mercy and pardon every time you enter God's house; is calling you to repentance from your open Bible; is saying to you, in the death of your friends and neighbors, 'Be ye also ready.' Delay no longer to yield to his blessed influences, lest he turn in wrath, and pronounce your doom in the fearful words, 'Because I have called and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded it; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof; I also will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh.'—Christian Banner.

THE MARAL'S LEAP.

The Maral is a large stag, which is found in the higher regions of eastern Siberia. His horns are highly valued by the Chinese; but it demands a brave hunter to follow him among the precipices and snowy peaks of that rugged country.

Mr. Atkinson, the traveler, to whose work we are indebted for the engraving, says: "Two Cossacks were out hunting the maral for two objects—food and antlers. One morning they found a magnificent animal, whose horns they saw were worth $80. They hunted him from valley to valley, till at last he ascended to a high craggy region. They followed, and saw that the stag went slowly on, evidently in fear. This led the hunters to believe that some other animals were in the pass, and they did not fire, but gradually drew nigh. Two huge bears suddenly sprang out into the ravine close behind the maral. The stag instantly bounded into the air, and safely leaped the chasm, which was thirty-three feet wide. One of the bears, springing after him, rushed over the cliff, falling more than four hundred feet, thus ending his career. The other stood on the brink of the chasm growling; but a leaden messenger sent him rolling after his companion.

"Having escaped this danger, the maral stood gazing at the hunters, without showing any sign of fear, while they admired his beautiful form and noble horns. Great as was the temptation to these ill-paid men, and easily as they might have shot him, to their honour and credit be it said, they left the noble animal in peace, and permitted him to remain king of his native wilds."

FARM AND GARDEN.

WHAT SHALL WE DO FOR FENCING?

EDITORS SOUTHERN CULTIVATOR:—Do you think the above an impertinent question?—Do you think that the question lacks interest? Does any one, who is interested in the agricultural prosperity of the South, think that the subject of fencing is comparatively unimportant? If so, let a few facts be stated, showing the money value of fences. From an "Essay on the Propriety and Policy of abolishing Fences" by Col. Isaac Croom, of Alabama, we learn some figures which will set this matter in a strong light. He says: "It is not believed to be extravagant to say, that to enclose a field one mile square with a crooked rail fence, ten-rails high, will cost in the canebrake, at the present time, (Nov. 1st, 1859,) in land, labor and timber $2,000. A single cross-fence of a mile will cost one fourth, and two of the same length, one half of this amount; so that one dividing fence in such an enclosure will bring its cost up to $2,500 and two such to $3,000."

This is only a part of his estimate, but it is enough to show that it costs a great deal to build even a crooked rail fence, even if his estimate is too high by one-half.

In the good old times before the war, when the planter owned the labor, and had an abundance of timber, it was not such a serious matter as it is at the present time. The actual expenditure of many was nothing, and, as timber was abundant, and considered valueless, except for fencing, why it was really a question about which the planter gave himself little anxiety. But, under the new order of things, it is very different, and I am persuaded that there is scarcely any subject of more practical importance to the farmers of the South now, than this of plantation fences. The great desideratum is a fence that shall be durable, economical of land, labor and timber, and at the same time efficient to keep your own stock in, and other people's stock out.

Now the question is, which shall it be, a hedge or a fence.

The Osage Orange, while succeeding well in the West, has not succeeded so well here as to be popular. From the experiments instituted with the White Macartney Rose, it would seem to be the hedge plant for us.

Further experiments on a "plantation scale" are needed to test their merits.

I will give the outlines of a plan which I conceive to be a good one, if judiciously carried out, not claiming originality for the idea, by any means.

The plan is as follows: In the first place, secure a large quantity of the seed of the Barren Locust, "Robinia Pseudacacia."

Select a portion of your land, say five—ten acres, according to the size of your farm, and the amount of seed. Prepare the soil well as for corn, and sow the seed (first preparing them by the steeping in hot water). Plant in rows, checked eight feet and cultivate well the first year and then let them take care of themselves—of course, protecting them from stock. Allowing for casualties, there will, in ten years, (if the soil be good,) be at least five hundred tons on every acre, of good timber for posts, and rails. Cut the posts and split the rails, and season for a few months.

Then, where you want to build your fence, throw up a slight ridge with turning plows or hoes, and build a straight post and rail fence, in a workmanlike manner, and you have a fence that will (casualties apart) last good for a half a century.

The plan of the straight rail fence mentioned, is the one so highly recommended by the late Mr. White, an eminently practical and reliable man. If any one is disposed to doubt the value and durability of Locust timber, I refer him to Downing and Michaux.

More anon,

Yours,

ON THE FENCE.

WHAT SHALL WE DO?

EDITORS SOUTHERN CULTIVATOR:—This seems to be troubling us now, and here is my idea of what we shall do. Plant one third of land in cotton, balance in wheat, oats, barley and pasture; raise hogs, cattle and everything you need; buy all the improved tools you can, such as reapers and mowers, thrashers and gang plows, and Sulky Cultivators; become independent of the "Killed Purson." Do you know, Brother Planters, that a Board appointed by the W. S. Agricultural Bureau, has decided that one pound of de-corticated (for hulled cotton seed) is worth ten pounds of corn; to fatten hogs, or beef cattle or to winter sheep on.

Clear your heads of idea that you can raise cotton to buy corn, hay, flour, etc. Try and be up and moving. Read all the agricultural papers you can and get your neighbors to do the same. Meet together and talk over your farm matters—pull together—every one help another. We have always had too much individuality in the South, not enough of combined action. Every trade has their association for the protection of their interests, except the cotton planter.

You can't compete with the world, unless you are up and doing. The old sickle is pushed aside by the reaper, the flail by the thrasher, and now the gang plow and riding cultivator will push out the single plow.

I will give the Cultivator ten years to any man who will purchase a Buckeye Cultivator and work it like a sensible man can use it, who will say he is not satisfied with the machine, or that he can't do twice as much work with it as he can with a common plow.

Respectfully,

SAN NARCUS.

VINE STAKES.—C. C. A.—"Light-wood" is becoming scarce and dear in many localities. Try our plan heretofore recommended it, these pages: Select a good large piece of good land—say an acre or two, "more or less," as you may need—manure well; plow deep and pulverize finely. Then lay off in rows, 6 feet apart, and plant it this fall in seed of the "China Berry," or "Pride of India" (Melia Azedarach). Drop the seed about 2 or 3 inches apart, and when the plants are 4 or 5 inches high, thin out to 18 inches, transplanting the "things" into another piece prepared soil. Give the plants clean and careful culture, keeping the weeds, suckers and sprouts down, and in 3 or 4 years you will have thousands of straight, handsome and durable vine stakes from 4 to 8 inches in diameter. They are light, strong and insect-proof; and can be raised as we describe, at a cost of not more than 2 or 4 cents each. In 6 foot rows, and at 18 inches in the row, you have 4840 plants per acre, worth at 2 cents each, $96.80—equal to $24.20 per acre per year, for 4 years cultivation—while "lightwood" posts, 6 inches square, and 8 feet long, would be considered cheap at 25 cents each, almost anywhere. Should these "China tree stakes" remain too long in the rows, and become too large for vine stakes, they will make excellent fuel and are purchased by cabinet-makers for bedsteads and other house furniture. Who will plant an acre or two of "China Berries" for vine stakes, the coming fall and report results? We forgot to mention that this tree possesses the valuable property of converting its sap wood into perfect wood in the earliest stages of its growth—so that a young stock, 6 inches in diameter, has frequently not more than one inch of sap wood. The Catalpa Bignonia (or "Catawba tree") has, also, been recommended for vine stakes; but it is not so readily obtained, nor so vigorous in growth as the "China tree." The Catalpa may be propagated by seed, or by pieces of the root—the latter way being the best.

Agricultural Reconstruction.

For the moment, material is vastly more important than political reconstruction to the late slave-holding States, and their system of agriculture should be modified to meet the abrupt change in their system of labor. The first change which must occur, and which will eventually prove equally beneficial to all parties concerned, will be the subdivision of landed estates, leading to better cultivation, to an extent to render the fractions each more profitable than the original estate. For the slovenly careless management of many of the larger Southern plantations, must be substituted the careful thrift of the North, and from the North must be introduced machinery; next several staple crops, which though not grown now in the South, can be cultivated to better advantage there than where now located. Among them we will cite four great agricultural interests which are annually looming up into greater importance; dairy products, wool, hops and fruit. While attending to treat each of these subjects in successive numbers, we will, for the present, confine ourselves to the first—the dairy and its products. This interest has assumed vast proportions in New York, Ohio, and other Northern States within the last ten or fifteen years. Oneida and Herkimer counties, for instance, annually convert the milk of 46,000 cows into cheese, and that cheese of a quality to surpass the average English cheese in the English market. The American Dairyman's Association, a large and influential body, sent a first-class man, Mr. Willard, to Europe, to obtain information upon the dairy management of the various countries there, and they issue annually a valuable report of some 130 pages, devoted to their own peculiar interest. The following extract from this report will give some idea of the magnitude of the dairy interest in the State of Ohio;

According to census reports, there were in Ohio, in 1859, 693,309 milch cows, and in 1860 the amount of butter manufactured in the State, according to assessor's returns, was 33,078,750 lbs., and of cheese, 20,788,074 lbs.; but in 1865, the number of milch cows had fallen off to 690,337, and of butter products to 32,554,335 lbs., and of cheese 16,940,213 lbs. Allowing an average of six acres of land for each cow, we have 4,142,022 acres devoted to keeping cows. Calling each cow worth $50, and each acre of land $50, and supposing that for each 15 cows there must be a team and farm implements, &c., of the value of $500, we have:

|--------------------------------|---------------|
| For value of cows..... | $34,516,750 |
| For value of land..... | 207,101,100 |
| For teams, implements, &c..... | 23,911,000 | | Total..... | $254,628,850 |

the amount of capital invested in the dairy husbandry of Ohio, the interest of which, at six per cent., is $15,871,381 per annum.

The value of the butter made in Ohio in 1865 at fifteen cents a pound, was $2,541,047, and allowing one-third of the milk produced in the State to have been consumed in its unmanufactured state, we have a total value of $18,461,245 for the dairy product of Ohio in 1865.

Now, what is most striking to a Marylander, a Virginian, a Carolinian, or indeed to any reader acquainted with what is called the Piedmont country, from the Pennsylvania line to Georgia, in drawing a comparison between the facts, as stated in the above report and as they exist in the South? At the North of the superiority of the cows, the high price of the grazing land and the shortness of the season; at the South, inferiority of cows cheapness of land, and length of season. He knows full well there are vast bodies of land much greater than that devoted to the dairy in Ohio, and in some respects under similar treatment, better grass land to be had on an average of five dollars an acre. He knows that where he has to feed cattle in winter one month, they have to be fed any where north of Mason and Dixon's line ten weeks.

Can the Southern country to which we allude breed good cows and produce fine beef? Steenberger, living in the valley of Virginia, near New Market, held for years a monopoly of the beef markets of Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York. George Patterson, on the hills near Sykesville, in Maryland, has had for years a herd of Devons of his own breeding unequalled even in England. As for butter, who has ever tasted in New York anything superior to the Waverly and Hampton butters, or that made in Baltimore and Howard counties, by Howard and Ramsey McHenry? And so for milk, there is not a private dairy on the continent yielding as many gallons per annum as that of Ross Winans in Baltimore.

For an estimate of the cost of cheese-making we recur to the Report of the Dairyman's Association, of Montgomery County, New York: "I suppose the average number of acres in dairy farms is about one hundred and twenty, and these should carry one year with another, fifteen cows, a span of horses, and other necessary stock. From these cows there should be made 11,500 pounds of cheese, and butter sufficient for the family, if made at a factory. At eleven cents a pound this amount to $1225. Add $100 for sale of pork, and we have $1325 as receipts. For expense accounts, we have interest on land at $80 per acre, and $2,000 in stock and machinery—$840; a man at $30 a month, eight months; a woman at $13 a month, sometimes, and an extra hand in haying and harvest, one month, $52: this amount to $238, leaving $587."

It will be observed here that the land is estimated at $80. The Southern dairyman should then have the advantage of his Northern competitor by the difference of between $5 and $80 in the cost of land, and a grazing season of at least three months longer. We are satisfied that with the Northern system of combination—that is, cheese factories judiciously located throughout the mountainous regions of the Southern States—for the manufacture of the milk of whole neighborhoods into cheese, the country would add to its resources another element of almost incalculable wealth.

The object of the writer is not only to open the eyes of his suffering countrymen to a great source of agricultural wealth hitherto neglected, but to show the dairyman at the North who contemplate emigration to other lands, the advantages offered them throughout the whole of the mountain region of the Southern States, and to assure them that the people have one quality left, at least, which has survived the ruin of civil war, and that is hospitality. Any man who he from Europe, from the Eastern States, in where he may, will be kindly received, and treated accordingly to his deserts.—Turf, Field and Farm.

Jerusalem the glorious!
The glory of the Elect!
O dear and future vision That eager hearts expect; Even now by faith I see thee:
Even here thy walls discern;
To thee my thoughts are kindled, And strive and pant and yearn: Jerusalem the only,
That look'st from heaven below, In thee is all my glory:
In thee is all my woe,
And though my body may not,
My spirit seeks thee false, Till flesh and earth return me To earth and flesh again.
O none can tell thy bulwarks, How gloriously they rise:
O none can tell thy capitals Of beautiful devices:
Thy loveliness oppresses All human thought and heart:
And none, O peace, O Zion, Can slay thee as thou art.
New mansion of new people, Whom God's own love and light Promote, increase, make holy, Identify, unite.
Thou City of the Angels!
Thou City of the Lord!
Whose everlasting music Is the glorious decachord:
And there the band of Prophets United praise ascribes, And there the twofold choros Of Israel's ransomed tribes.
The lily-beds of virgins, The roses' martyr-glow, The cohort of the Fathers Who kept the faith below, And there the Sole Begotten Is Lord in regal state; He, Judah's mystic Lion, He, Lamb Immaculate,
O fields that know no sorrow!
O state that fears no strife!
O spicely bow'rs! O land of flow'rs!
O realm and home of life!

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

"Quicken us, O Lord!"

The sweet singer of Israel pours forth his most aspirations after increased spiritual life and power, in terms such as these,
"Will thou not revive us again; that thy people may rejoice in thee! Show us thy mercy, O Lord, and grant us thy salvation." The prophet, long centuries after, finds his spirit burdened, and burning with the same holy desire, and in an agony of earnestness exclaims: "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy." St. Peter, exhorts the people to repent, and be converted, that their sins might be blotted out, "when times of refreshing should come from the presence of the Lord."

Arrival is God's work as much as the rainbow, the showers, and the fertility that make the yellow harvest smile: and it is the Church's work as much as the sowing and the cultivation are man's work. We are to be co-workers, and fellow-helpers; we are to do our duty, and God "will open to us the windows of heaven, and pour us out a blessing, that there shall not be lack enough to receive it. The Church must deny self much, pray much, believe and expect much; and it shall come to pass that the Lord will pour out his spirit and whosoever shall call the name of the Lord shall be saved."

Brothers, sons of God, heirs of heaven, lay this matter to heart. Think, while in places the glory of God burns as a rapturous flame; while the brightness gleams afar, and many rejoice because their light has come, and the glory of God has risen upon them; while many newly turned from darkness unto light, are thronging into the path that shines more and more, there are other beleaguered regions where gross darkness settles down as a thick overshadowing cloud. And is it thus with you? Is the Lord a respecter of persons, "is his mercy clean gone forever, and will he be favorable no more?" No, blessed be his holy name, he waits to be gracious, he assures us with exceeding great and precious promises, that if we draw nigh unto him, he will draw nigh unto us, that if we wait upon him, we shall renew our strength.

"Pray for us," said the great Apostolic Missionary, "that the word of the Lord may have proper course, and be glorified." Remember, God's ministers have the heavly treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God.
Remember, it is God that gives the increase, and that He sends this increase in answer to the prayer of faith. Have you ceased to doubt God, and yet will you doubt him without a cause? Do not let circumstances apparently unfavorable discourage you. What if there has been in-rain for three years and six months what if the heavens seem as brass and the earth as iron; what if the noise of the wheels as yet cannot be heard, continue in prayer, even seven times; and a cloud shall gather, and there shall be to the ear of faith the sound of an abundance of rain.

Soon the cloud "as a man's hand," shall spread its sable wings from sky to sky, and soon it shall pour the precious torrent down. The dried earth shall robe itself in living green, the withered shrubs shall bud and burst in fragrant blooms; the springs that run among the hills, and flow in the valleys, and give drink to every beast of the field, shall start rejoicing on their way.

Look, brethren, see how the ways of Zion mourn, let the sight stir your spirit within you, even as the sight of a city, wholly given to idolatry, stirred the spirit of him, whom the love of Christ constrains and who, whether he stood on Mt. Moriah, or in Mars Hill, or in the Forum of Rome, ceased not to warn, day and night, with tears, and cry, "behold the Lamb!" Your children are out of the Ark of safety; your neighbors are aliens, and strangers to the saving grace of God; many of your brethren have lost their first love; iniquity abounds; ministers, who should be flames of fire, and wield a sword of double edge, and heavenly temper keels; "are troubled, perplexed, and cast down;" oh, brethren, come up to the help of Lord, "to the help of the Lord against the mighty!"

"Awake, Jerusalem, awake!
No longer in thy slumbers lie down.
The garments of salvation take,
Thy beauty and thy strength put on.
Shake off the dust that blinds thy sight,
And hides the promise from thine eyes.
Arise, and struggle into light,
The great Deliverer calls, arise.
Shake off the bands of sad despair, Zion, assert thy liberty; Look up, thy broken heart prepare And God shall set the captive free, Vessels of mercy, sons of grace, Be purged from every sinful stain.
Be like your Lord, his word embrace.
Nor bear his hallowed name in vain.
The Lord shall in your front appear, And lead the pompous triumph on;
His glory shall bring up the rear,
And perfect what his grace began."

BRAZIL.

Mr. Editor:—I write you this letter, in compliance with the promise made you in your office, when you kindly proffered the use of your paper as a medium for communicating my views on Brazil to my friends in the States.

We had a slow and tedious trip from New Orleans to Peru, 26 days. To my surprise, I found Para, a large and handsome city, 35,000, or 40,000 inhabitants.
Beautifully situated, with room for becoming one of the largest cities in the world. Its commercial facilities, are not surpassed by any city on the globe.

I was astonished to hear from men on the spot, men who could have no selfish purpose to serve, that the finest lands, far above overflow, abound on many of the great tributaries of the Amazon, on the Tapajoo, and Madera particularly, the lands are very rich, and partake much of the nature of table lands, and are fanned by perpetual breezes, and are almost untouched.

Mr. Bond, brother of Dr. T. E.
Bond, of Baltimore, is of opinion that the best openings for American settlements in Brazil, are on the Madera River, about 800 to 1000 miles above Para. That the country is not only very rich, but healthy and pleasant, not oppressively hot. This gentleman has resided long in this empire, first at Rio, and next in this city, Para, where he is now American Consul, and he considers Para, as healthy as Rio, says both cities are quite healthy.

Our ship likewise stopped two days at the city of Bahia. This is a fine city of 150,000 to 200,000 inhabitants, and has, as you are aware, a magnificent bay, for its harbor. I give you a brief extract from my diary concerning it.

"At 8 A. M. we came in sight of Bahia, and as we entered the bay, all were deeply impressed with the wonderful beauty of the scene before us; and all around us, was spread the bay in all its enchanting beauty, with its far-off shores, covered with everlasting green, with here and there the beautiful homes of the dweller, on its peaceful borders. Toward the city, were the ships of all nations, resting safely in this secure and spacious harbor. Toward the North and West, was the city in crescent shape, as it rose, from the water, to the summit of steep and lofty hills, and spread over the broken lands beyond. To the West of the bay, the city descends abruptly, and spreads out over a beautiful plain, in striking contrast with the North; and yet to a spectator on ship-board, the crescent shape of the city is quite as manifest as if all rested on a similar surface. Taking it all in all, it presented to the eye of the waying voyager, a scene of varied grandeur and beauty, such as he may never again behold on earth.

On the 5th of August, we were gliding into the harbor of Rio, while all on board, were gazing with wonder and delight upon the magnificently wild, and grand scenery on each side of the channel that heads to the city.

The passengers were promptly laded at a convenient wharf, and were soon climbing the high hill, upon the summit of which is situated the spacious emigrant hotels, capable of accommodating some 400 or 500 persons. Here emigrants are supplied with good wholesome food, and clean rooms and beds, and the surroundings are neatly kept. Persons, not classed as "government emigrants," in common with those "emigrants," can lodge and eat at this house for 40 cents per day, and if they prefer to eat in the city, they can sleep at the emigrant house free of charge, and this is done by many who go out as "passengers" and pay their way.

One thing is quite plain, and that is this, the Brazilian government are strongly impressed with the importance of getting emigrants from the Southern States, hence, every reasonable precaution is taken to secure their comfort, and they have now an excellent man, Dr. Galvoa, at the head of the emigration office, he is a man of noble qualities, of head and heart, and he gives himself wholly to his work, and in such a manner as to show that his heart is in it.

In all my life I have scarcely found a man who has impressed me more favorably—with all his culture, he is perfectly accessible to the humblest emigrant—nor can I forget his excellent assistant, Capt. Slaughter, a man who seems to know no pleasure, equal to that of serving his exiled brethren, who are seeking homes in Brazil.
Among all the various officials, and their assistants, there is manifested a desire to render all due attention to the wants of the emigrants. Even before the "Catharine Whiting" landed, Dr. Galvoa, was aboard, his official character unknown to the emigrants, and was inquiring how they fared, etc., and when a written statement of the facts in the case, was drawn up by one of the passengers, and signed by very nearly all on board, in cabin and steerage, and duly presented to him, he promptly instituted a formal inquiry into the whole matter; and the result was a fine of $5,000, was laid upon the owners of the ship—and and in addition to this, new and stringent regulations were made for the protection of emigrants in the future, and henceforth, I do not apprehend that such villainous impositions will be practiced as in the case of the "Whiting."

The Messrs. Nathan, of Rio, have now a contract, which I have seen, for bringing emigrants from New Orleans, and other Southern ports to Brazil. In that contract, there are some excellent regulations: among others, these two evils are to be prevented, in the future. 1. The shipment of low worthless people. 2. To secure comfortable passage to all on shipboard. Their terms are $70 for each passenger, payable in four years, and $30 cash, for each passenger over 8 years of age. I think they intend sending you their card for publication. Rev.
Mr. Dunn, informs me that he too will have a ship in New Orleans, ready to sail with emigrants, by the last of December, and he assures me that they shall be properly attended to in every respect.
I had a free and full conversation with Mr. Nathan, in which he unfolded his plans for bringing out emigrants, and I am fully satisfied that our best families, may rely upon having such accommodations as will secure their comfort while on ship-board. Mr. Nathan, an-thorizes me to say, a good steamer will be ready to leave New Orleans at the latest, by the 1st of December next.

As to the country, I have been out of this city too little, to form anything more than a general opinion, based on what I hear from others—quite a number are coming back from their explorations disappointed, but I find in most of these cases, those persons have come here with extravagant, and indeed foolish ideas, or dreams about the country—again, others have wandered about, until they are confused and unable to make a selection. But from all I can learn, I believe, at least three-fourths of the emigrants are well pleased, I am sure a large majority are delighted—while quite a number may be found—who are perfectly extravagant in lauding this goodly land. I have learned enough in this great city, and its surroundings, to be fully satisfied that it is well for me, and my family to be here. I expect to be naturalized before Parliament adjourns, some of our party who came on the "Whiting" are already citizens of Brazil.

You will see more evidences of dirt and poverty, in one week's sojourn in New Orleans, than you will here, in a month, yet this city is more than twice as large as New Orleans. There is an air of cleanness, and plenty, almost universally manifested here. The city is one of the healthiest on the globe, the climate now at least, perfectly delightful—and among all the complaints that I hear from disappointed emigrants, I think I have never in one single instance heard one complain of bad health, or want of food, or of bad water, —and I conclude, that a land where good food abounds, where general good health prevails, and the climate is pleasant, it cannot be a bad country.

If a man comes here with one thousand dollars, he can buy property on a credit to five times the amount; if he comes with the means to make a two thousand dollar payment, he can buy property on long credits, to the amount of 10 or $15,000, and in the same proportion, for greater or less amounts in cash. Again, if a man comes here, with plenty of money, he can easily get clear of it, in traveling, and paying for interpreters, or by boarding at fashionable hotels in the city: If he is poor, let him stay away, unless he comes to work, at least for a time, as do the poor in all lands beneath the sun. There is no opening for laborers in the cities, mechanics wages are very low—and let all our industrious people who come here, go directly to the country, prepared to work, as they have done in their native land, and a prosperous future is before them.

Documents, recently laid before Parliament, now in session, claim for the Empire a population of over 11,000,000 of inhabitants, and among those, less than 2,000,000 of slaves, I think only about 500,000—and that number is steadily diminishing—considerable numbers are being freed in various ways.

Religious liberty is practically almost as perfect here, as in the States, and legally, it is about as in England. The press, is quite as free as in the States, indeed and is far more so, for there is no danger of mob-law here, as in the United States, and the constitutional provisions for liberty of the press, are as good as in any part of the world—and I may add, that this freedom is freely indulged by the Brazilians. The Emperor comes in for a full share of criticism, also do his ministers.
In my next, I shall have something to say about Protestantism and its prospects here.

Fraternally yours,

J. E. NEWMAN.

THE JUDGMENT.

[Extract from a sermon by the Rev. W. M.
Lofield.]

The creation, although removed from us by the lapse of six thousand years, affects us as powerfully as if it occurred but a year past. The fall of man, embraced in that immediate history, so deeply and ruinously affected the race, that we continue as such to drag the calamity with us. And, obviously great as is the effect upon us of that remote transaction, equally direct and powerful is the influence of the death of Christ, although happening at the beginning of our present era.

As direct and all controlling is the judgment of the great day, happen when it will; for it is a part and close of that plan in the divine administration, arranged exclusively for man. Nor is it possible for any one to separate himself from the destiny predetermined for all.

The race is a unit extending itself from the creation to the judgment, and every section of this immense and living line, is equally impressed by every act, and proposed act of God relating to them. It is thus seen, that the day of judgment being the appointment of God, for the exafnination and righteous disposition of the individuals of the race, is as imminent in its applications as if announced for to-morrow. If therefore it enters at all into our thoughts, it must impress a measure of its solemnity upon our minds, and our character. Nor can mirth, indifference, or prayer-lessness be made consistent with such a tone of mind; there can be neither occasion nor inclination for trifling, with the judgment preparations looking down upon us.

If the reality of the judgment entered properly into our plans of life, its employment would be strictly spiritual; they would be directed principally to those preparations which now promise a meetness for the appointment; and the engagements of life would all be subordinated to this highest and most urgent obligation.

We cannot be mistaken in the reckoning, that most of us are far behind in our preparations, nor will they be suitably advanced, unless we give more and deeper thought to our personal interests in the issues of that day. Only occasionally a voice rises above the din of life to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance.

LETTER FROM BISHOP PIERCE.

We find in the Southern Christian Advocate, an interesting letter from Bishop Pierce. We give an extract which cannot fail to cheer and encourage the ministers and members of our church:

"In the District meeting two leading facts demand special notice.
First, there has been the most remarkable revival of religion in the town of Dawsonville and the surrounding country that I have heard of anywhere. It began last April a year ago, and yet continues, in its influence upon the Church. At the close of the war, the people in that region were divided—hostile—fenda and difficulties were the order of the day. The few remaining members of our Church were cold, discourage and without ministerial help. But they rallied and strengthened each other in the Lord. They established prayer-meetings. A gacious influence distilled up in them. They prayed on. Sinners began to feel and yield. Congregations increased. Preachers were called in—the work spread—enemies were reconciled—the Spirit of peace and love rested upon the whole community, and in the progress of their labors, the few forlorn disciples who began these meetings counted two hundred and twenty-five converts. The Church has grown strong in numbers—mighty in faith and abundant in good works.
What think you—when I tell you that Northern emissaries are prowling about this peaceful fold—seeking to divide, scatter and entice away these sheep—this found and saved? On such wickedness I will not comment, lest I sin with my pen.
Surely the Church, North, does not know how her agents outrage all truth—all righteousness—all Christian love!

The second fact is relative to Sunday-schools. The preachers and members are at work, as everywhere else, in this department. In several circuits we have more Sunday-schools than preaching places.
But the new feature in this region is, that Judge Irvin in his charge to the Grand Jurors of the several counties, has recommended the appointment of a Sunday-school Board, composed of leading citizens, who shall explore the county—address the people—get up scholars—provide funds—if possible, secure teachers, and thus every neighborhood is supplied. The impulse is wonderful—the excitement salutary and fruitful. Old and young are quickened into new life. This scheme is carrying out what has long been, as you know, a favorite idea of mine.

No common school system will ever reach the people in the south. Millions have been sunk in this experiment in Georgia. Let every county adopt Judge Irvin's suggestion, and in twelve months, every boy and girl of ten years of age will be able to read the Bible. The facts reported our meeting on this subject were thrilling.
I cannot detail them now. I will only add that at one of those schools, one Sabbath morning the religious excitement waxed so strong, that fifteen of the scholars were converted before the close of the exercises. In this movement, so far, there has been no conflict of churches—no sectarian interruptions. If the school is organized at a Methodist church, it is a Methodist school—if at a Baptist church, it is a Baptist school—if at a private house or an academy, its denominational relation is determined by the circumstances of the case and the predilections of the teachers.

But enough. To sum up—"I thank God, and take courage." I never knew the church more united —more active and, as a generathing, more inclined to see and reform her faults. The preachers are enduring hardness as good soldiers.
They complain less and work harder —eager to suffer for the kingdom of heaven's sake. John Wesley was with us in the right hand of G. F. PIERCE.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
The Natchez District Conference, REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

The circumstances under which we are now living have invested the subject of education with extreme importance to the Southern people in general, and to our church especially. The time has come when intellectual culture must assume a more exact form, and be carried to a higher development of the individual. Upon this will depend, far more than heretofore, the respectability and personal influence of our people, and in this will lie to a very great extent, their power to resist the forces that operate towards their political and social disintegration and death. The higher regions of thought and of truth must be more distinctly brought within the grasp of the young mind of this generation. Men and women must begin to learn that their earthly life is associated with higher and holier things than the dollar, the rapid senseless chit-chat, the empty sentimentalism of dreamy novelists, or to be waited on by a retinue of servants that secure ignoble exemption from manual and manual toil. All work—mind and hand, and heart work—must be found to possess a dignity and worth from its connection with a true mental and spiritual life. The individual must be made to feel that his true worth resides in himself, not without him, in the noble powers of thought and sensibility with which God has endowed him, and which Christ has redeemed from ruin.

To effect this, requires careful, systematic, constant, painstaking culture—a training and culture which should have their seed time in the nursery, and their development in the school.

Your committee, think that much of the education, or rather school-work about us is wretchedly defective. Children are put to the school for a few months, to learn enough of arithmetic to fit them, as is thought, for the counting house, or to be sufficiently glossed with the varnish of ologies to dazzle empty minds with a show of learning; or they are rushed through the colleges in such impatient haste as to make smatterers instead of scholars. Such a proceeding is a waste of time, and money and a cheat on the pupil and society. Much more attention should be given to mental drilling, and to acquiring a knowledge of the English tongue. Our children must be educated with a view to a higher and better fulfillment of all the relationships of life.

Your committee do not hesitate to say that our schools must become thoroughly Christian. The spirit of Christ must sanctify the study and the recitation room. Pupils must be taught that the toil required to master any subject, to compass the simplest or the severest work—is Christian toil and is designed to prepare them for Christian work in the great field of life education, for special pursuits, as the ultimate end must cease, and all works, and all special preparation for them, must aim at the glory of God in Christ. Only thus, can education be invested with its true dignity and value, and made a great power in the development of a true human life, and the conversation of social and political integrity. Truth and duty must be the spirit and aim of all real intellectual work.

There are some schools in the territory of this District, that with proper effort and management may be worked into instruments for the right education of our boys and girls. But it must be accepted as a primary condition, that this work is not left to one or a few individuals, who are immediately connected with the schools as teachers. The church in its organic form, and in its individual membership must work. It ought to be the most eminent patron, and the most vigilant custodian of education. In general, our college, especially the male, should be well endowed, at least, to an extent sufficient to secure the ablest faculty. This will also insure good discipline, and a high grade of scholarship. If possible, and as far as possible, our schools should possess funds for the education of the poor. But, especially, should all our best male colleges have an endowment for the education of candidates for the ministry. This is a point that cannot longer be neglected, without very great injury to our ministerial success and usefulness.

Your committee wish to urge the most earnest and vigorous efforts of the preachers and people of this District, in behalf of Centenary College, located at Jackson, La., and under the Presidency of Rev. W. H. Watkins, D. D. The efficiency of this school is materially crippled, if its existence is not periled, by a want of funds sufficient to furnish it with a full equipment for its proper working. The Trustees have devised a plan for its endowment, which it is hoped will secure the needed funds, and thus make the college a great intellectual nursery, and powerful help to our church.

We recommend these resolutions, viz:

- 1st. Resolved, That the times demand of us a thorough intellectual education, pregnant with the spirit of Christianity, as an essential preparation of the rising generation for the high and solemn responsibilities that they must assume.

- 2d. Resolved, That the church as a body, and as individuals, cannot escape the responsibility of the most vigorous and persistent efforts to give her children the best, truest education.

- 3d. Resolved, That Centenary College has special claims on this District, and that we should use every effort to make that Institution independent, and of the highest grade.

Montgomery Conference—Camden District.

Georgiana is a depot town on the Alabama and Florida Rail Road, 15 miles below Greenville, in Butler county, Ala. The inhabitants number twenty or twenty-five families. Such a thing as Methodist preaching, was never at this place until last year, when W. W. Graham, of the Sepulga District, established an appointment, using the school-house as a place of worship. This year, the official members of the Sepulga Circuit selected it as a place for holding their fourth Quarterly Meeting, which was appointed to meet Oct. 12 and 13.

Reaching the place according to appointment, I found a new house, neat and comfortable, not completed, but, in a condition to be dedicated to God, and used in His worship. But there was one distressing feature connected with it. In the Quarterly Conference it was announced that a debt had been incurred in the erection of the building. The lot on which the house was built, was donated. The few members there, some of them being mechanics, did much of the work themselves. So that the house so far has cost but $360. Of this amount, $330 was declared unpaid. Where this amount was to come from, no one could tell. Three hundred and thirty dollars, one is ready to say is a very small sum, but in a poor pine-woods country, scarcely settled, and the inhabitants, poor farmers and mechanics, whose wives when they go to "meeting," put on their dresses to cook while they are gone, and take their babies in their arms, and walk to Church; and where Methodism is unbaptized, and a stranger in the midst of hard shells, and other Baptists; and where the utmost farthing that can be raised has already been paid, and these hard times to battle with; and, where the whole circuit reports at the third Quarterly Meeting, $2 50, quarterage; and at the fourth $17 10, it is an overwhelming amount! It is more than fifty thousand in a rich and fashionable city. But the debt must be paid. The house was to be dedicated to God, on Sabbath, 11 o'clock A. M. It had not been built according to Discipline. Brother H. L. Davis, a poor man who works with his own hands to support his wife and children, resolved that a church should be built, and on his own responsibility, assuming all liabilities; had it erected, securing a deed to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The Quarterly Conference resolved, that each official member should take a subscription, and raise in his post of the circuit what he could.

On Sabbath, I preached a sermon from Psalm 84: 12, and dedicated the house to God's service, and baptized two infants, and administered the Eucharist to nine preachers and thirty-six private members. The annals of the past record no such thing as a Quarterly Meeting at this place, and the interest was universal and intense—every body was there.

At night, W. H. Morris, preached from Job 22: 21, after which Bro. Graham organized a society with 29 members. He decided to try a collection, to meet that terrible debt. I was put forward to do the begging. At first no one seemed disposed to give anything—they thought they had done all they could in that line. But we kept begging, and making propositions, and soon to the great astonishment and profound delight of all concerned, we had $306 subscribed. The other twenty-four dollars will be paid. The members told Bro. Graham, next day they thought they would pay the whole of their quarterage at that place.

The meeting was continued with promise of good—others will join the church. Brother Graham reports over 120 additions to the church, on his work during the last quarter. ANSON WEST.

From the St. Louis Christian Advocate.
GEN. STERLING PRICE.

We give an extract from the address of Rev. Dr. W. A. Smith of St. Louis, on the funeral occasion of this distinguished citizen.

It is not my place, as I have said, to vindicate the memory of the illustrious dead. That is the work of the political speaker or historian, as the case may be. I merely state, as it seems fit I should do, the honors which those claim for him who were his compatriots in arms, and the sharers with him of a common misfortune! Honors which embalm his memory in their hearts, and which bring them here to day to mingle their honest tears at his grave with those of his deeply afflicted family. But, as I said, mine is the further duty of the minister to lay before you the claims of his religious character; to encourage you by his Christian virtues, and warn you by his defects. And bad Gen. Price a Christian character? Yes, and one much more decidedly marked than of which many of you may be aware. He took an early opportunity to let me know the past winter that he considered himself a member of my congregation, and that he would gladly avail himself of any aid I could render him in preparing to connect himself more formally with the Church. I embraced opportunities for incidental conversations on the subject of his religious state. And not long before his late sickness I had a more extended interview with him, from which I obtained more definite and satisfactory views of his religious status. I was already aware that he had received a decidedly religious education from his Presbyterian parents in early life; that he grew up and always cultivated and avowed the most profound reverence for the Christian religion, and all her honored representatives wherever he met with them—on "Change, in the social circle, or on the tented field, no less than in camp-hospitals or the city pulpits. I knew all that, and that whatever might be objectionable in his habits, judged by the Christian standard, there lived not a man who could point to the slightest blot upon his character as a man of indefeasible integrity and honor. Indeed, I had often had occasion to believe, in regard to him, what is very unusual in respect to most other public men especially, that is, that his reputation was as unsullied as his character for worldly virtue was without spot or blemish! But I was not aware until this interview, of the clearness of his belief and the deep interest he felt in the great work of repentance and faith. I conversed with him freely on these points. We mutually agreed to renew the conversation at an early day. The opportunity to do so, however, never again presented itself. On Friday last I reached home from the late Conference in Kansas City. I repaired at once to attend the funeral at the house of Mr. G. Schofield, and from thence hastened immediately to see General Price. My presence, as I supposed it would, had its effect. A crowd of thoughts seemed to rush on his mind; but he was soon composed. Said I, "General, if you were as well as I am, you could, as a penitent sinner, only trust in Christ, that is, you could only consent—heartily consent—to take Christ alone as your Savior—consent to be saved on the ground of His atonement and intercession, and not on the ground of any worthiness you have or can acquire; and furthermore consent (for this is involved in the former, necessarily) to be governed and controlled by Him in all things." Said I, "General, if you were well you could do no more than this, and now that you are sick you can do this as certainly as if you were well. Trust, my friend! Trust in Christ!" The suggestions produced great mental activity. His voice was nearly entirely gone under the force of his disease. The friends present will remember what followed. Struggling for voice to speak he feebly uttered, "Ambition! ambition! ambition! Ambition for one's Country—ambition for one's family, and friends—ambition for one's self. Ambition! too much! too much!" To you his manner might have indicated some incoherence of thought. To myself, however, who could well understand the associations of mind which revived these recollections, the expressions were profoundly significant of the deepest repentance. I therefore was well prepared to appreciate his last utterance to me. Turning his eyes upon me—and for the last time, I think—he said (struggling for utterance) in broken accents which, however, I distinctly caught, "I do trust—my Father told me to trust." He did trust, I doubt not. He now rests from the toils of a weary life, from the anguish of disappointed hopes, and the reproaches of a life of ambition. He now rests in the companionship of his honored parents, and I will not scruple to say, of many a pious soldier boy who looked on him as his father, and who pressed his mother's Bible to his heart as he sunk in the arms of death on the field of blood! Yes, he rests with them in the bosom of his Saviour. Peace to his memory. We have regrets for our common misfortunes; we have tears of sympathy to shed with his afflicted family, and, thank God, we have rejoicings that "he has gone to the grave" to be welcomed to the companionship of the family of heaven!

From the Southern Review.
Instincts of the Negro.
Is there not something more than mere grade—something more besides mere plus and minus in the intellectual scale of races? Has not each race of men, like the Species or Varieties of animals, its peculiar instincts? The horse, ass, and zebra are called species of one genus—the bull-dog, grey-hound, fox-hound and Newfoundland dogs are called varieties belonging to another genus. Each one is known to have its own instincts, and no matter how much climate and other circumstances are changed, each species or variety retains its peculiar characteristics so long as the race blood is kept pure. Has not the Caucasian, the Mongol, the American savage, and the negro, each its instincts, which gives directions to its thought and actions? All attempts to make the negro and Indian, in America, think and act like the Spaniards or Anglo-Saxons have failed, and the Mexican people, at this moment, for the most part a hybrid mass of curs, are committing upon each other all the outrages to which their instincts lead them. We expect nothing better of the degenerate Spanish race crossed upon the Indian stock whose blood flows in the veins of nine-tenths of the whole population, to say nothing of the negro element.

Man, we repeat, only obeys a general law. The species of each genus differ in their physical structure, in their instincts, habits, intelligence and docility. Among the Equidae, we have instanced the horse, ass and quagga, to which may be added, the onager, the dromedary, and the hemione, making six species of this genus. Some of these are tameable and useful to man; others are wild and untameable; and all differ in intelligence and instincts. If we take the felines, the canines, the monkeys or any other genus, the same law holds. No genus affords stronger examples than that of Man. The negro, like the ass, is stupid, docile, easily domesticated, and his proper condition is that of subordination to the white man. The Indian, on the contrary, like the hyena among the canines, the tiger among the felines, the onager among the Equidae, is untameable and is killed by domestication. The very atmosphere of civilization is poison to him.

We regard the Toltec or Aztec races of Central America as a different race from the barbarous tribes, but have no time for discussing that point. They are as different as the buffalo and domestic ox, or the fox and the wolf.

That race-instinct, which more particularly interests the people of the United States at this time, is the constitutional disinclination of the negro to steady labor, and especially agricultural labor. The negro is a gregarious and social animal—he seeks towns and crowds of all kinds—he must be in some menial capacity to a superior race, as waiter in hotels and steamboats, boot-black, white-washer, wood-sawyer, domestic servant, etc. They will, also, associated with the whites, work pretty well at the mechanic arts, as bricklayers, carpenters, blacksmiths, etc.; but no one ever knew a negro family to purchase a farm, at a distance from a town, settle down on it and cultivate it steadily and successfully so as to accumulate property from year to year.

The negro, in his native land, or elsewhere, has never, since the dawn of history, been an agriculturist, except in subordination to the whites and under compulsion. In Africa he has no where tilled the soil beyond his immediate and temporary wants; and never beyond the starving-point of the great mass of the population. To this fact and their incapacity for self-government alone, must we attribute the fact that this immense continent has a black population of not more than 80,000,000 to 100,000,000, when it should have been nearer 1,000,000,000, if it had the agricultural system of China, India, France, or England.

The agricultural history of Liberia, St. Domingo, Jamaica, and other West India islands is known to every school-boy. There were in the United States before the war 500,000 free negroes who took no part in the agriculture than Jews or Gypsies, both of whom have the same anti-agricultural instinct.

It requires no prophet to foretell the fate of our great staple States. As in St. Domingo and Jamaica, sugar will cease to be cultivated, and in less than ten years cotton and rice will cease to be articles of export. Under the stimulus of high prices, the 'old regulars,' those negro laborers, who have long been drilled to field culture, may from long habit keep up some show of industry for a time, but in proportion as these die out and another generation grows up, and the foreign competition brings prices down, will negro labor degenerate, and cease to compete with the steady, efficient labor of other countries. We venture the prediction that the growing cotton crop will be the largest made for many years to come, and that not one planter in ten will pay expenses out of the growing crop. The expenses on every bale of cotton, including the government tax, and all charges from the time it leaves the plantation, until sold in a foreign market, are estimated at not less than twenty-five dollars, and were any room left for doubt, this alone would settle the question.

In spite of the sad lessons of the past, the abstractions of John Quincy Adams and Ezeiel Hull have gained strength with years, until we now see our beautiful Republic, under which we once lived prosperous and happy, a purifying carcass, under the corroding effects of doctrines contrary alike to humanity, to reason, to nature and to truth.

The Pan Anglican Synod.

The following is the pastoral address which has been adopted by the Synod, and signed individually by the Bishops:

"To the faithful in Christ Jesus, to Priests and Deacons, and the Lay Members of the Church of Christ in communion with the Anglican Branch of the Church Catholic:

"We, the undersigned, Bishops, gathered under the good providence of God for prayer and conference at Lambeth, pray for you that ye may obtain grace, mercy and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ our Savior.

"We give thanks to God, brethren beloved, for the faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love toward the saints, which hath bound us together; and for the knowledge of Christ which through you hath been spread abroad among the most vigorous races of the earth; and with one mouth we make our supplications to God, even the Father, that by the power of the Holy Ghost He would strengthen us with His might, to amend among us the things which are amiss, to supply the things which are lacking, and to reach forth unto higher measures of love and zeal in worshipping Him, and in making known His name; and we pray that in His good time He would give back unto His whole Church the blessed gift of Unity in Truth.

"And now we exhort you in love that ye keep whole and undefiled the faith once delivered to the saints as ye have received it of the Lord Jesus. We entreat you to watch and pray, and to strive heartily with us against the frauds and subtleties wherewith the foe has been aforetime and is now.

"We beseech you to hold the sure Word of God, all the nical Scriptures of the Old Testament; and that by study of these oracles of God, you know more of the Lord Jesus our Savior, whom they reveal, and of the will of God, they declare.

"Furthermore, we entreat you to guard yourselves and your brethren from the growing superstitions and traditions with which in these days the truth of God has been overlaid; as otherwise, so by the pretension to a sovereignty over God's Word, served for the See of Rome, the practice exaltation of the Virgin Mary as mediator place of her Divine Son; and addressing of prayers to her intercessor between God and man. Of such beware, we beseech you, knowing that the jealous God not his honor to another.

"Build yourselves up, beloved, in your most holy grow in grace and in the knowledge and love of Jesus Christ our Show forth before all men by faith, self-denial, purity, and conversation, as well as by labors for the people among God hath so widely spread by the setting forth of His to the unbelievers and the that ye are indeed the servants Him who died for us to His Father to us, and to be a life for the sins of the whole

Abide steadfast in communion of saints, where hath granted you a place. faith for oneness with Christ, blessed Sacrament of His blood. Hold fast the true worship and order of God's grace ye have from the primitive Church of causing divisions contrary doctrine ye have received, and seek for unity among selves, and among all in Christ Jesus, and the good make you perfect, and keep bodies, souls, and spirits, coming of the Lord Jesus

CHURCH FINANCIAL.

The multiplication of finance in the church, is not often, complicated in its relations, requiring much and attention to business, collecting investing funds for use here not desirable. In all the coming ages, and in all the heavenly places, to the highest orders of creatures, and we may well believe, to all intelligent beings, the Church is to make God manifest in the inexpressible facts of its history. No words could express Him. It required facts. It required a history. It required an incarnate God carrying on the redeeming work by the Holy Spirit in a living Church. And the judgment of the last Day is to bring them out

That Church is the great misfortune of this land, and honest men in this section are beginning to wish its power circumscribed, and its legal foundations weakened.

If Dr. Grooks refuses to recognize the fact that the law of 1844 is still going on, he will learn that there are men in the land who refuse to recognize that act of the Supreme Courts as a just act, final in its effects and too sacred to be questioned. It is not so, and in this period of revolution, forced on us by the

To SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO OUR AGENTS.

In making changes please state the place from which, as well as the place to which the change is made. We are very desirous that our subscription list should be doubled between this and the meeting of our own patronizing Conferences. Planters will have money on hand early this year if at all, so that now is the most favorable time to secure subscribers. As they have no longer any temptation to invest their incomes in either land or negroes, they can easily be persuaded to take a paper. Try it. Every good man should have in his house a paper bringing the weekly statement of the work of God among the Churches. He should read the precious record of the death of holy men and women, whose final triumph strengthens our hopes, and subdues our passions. Every one given to thinking, and forecasting, will need much light to keep up with the astounding events which are shaping hourly the fortunes of the Southern people. The Advocate will furnish some contribution towards supplying these wants.

A note from Rev. Dr. Watkins, the President of this Institution, dated October 10th, 1867, says: "We are all at our posts, in spite of quarantine. Up to this time we escape yellow fever, and hope to shut it out completely. Centenary is ready for all students who may wish to attend."

The health of Jackson is, in these times, no unimportant item in the estimate of parents and students. The great convenience of access to this college must determine many to patronize it. The Institution that leads off in reducing the price of board down to what it will and must come before twelve months roll round, will most command the notice and patronage of the public.

THE EPIDEMIC.

The decrease in the number of deaths for the week, and for the last two days is very marked. Sixty days is the usual duration of yellow fever—with or without frost. Let our friends be patient, the delay of a week may save life. Those who return to the city, too soon afford fresh fuel for the fever!

Remember, that as God approveth not alms, or any other work, without charity, so neither charity itself without discretion.

THE LATE REV. DR. DRAKE.

We insert two letters which were written just previous to his death, by this saintly man. His lovely spirit, and the fire of a true itinerant breathe in these, his last words. They are prefaced with an explanatory sentence or two from an altogether authentic source.

"The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance."

"As the Rev. Dr. Drake, late of the Mississippi Conference, died just before the commencement of our National trouble, and as it was designed to prepare an extended sketch of his life for publication in book form, no lengthened account has ever been written for our periodicals. As the intended work has been unavoidably delayed, and many inquiries have from time to time been made by his friends, from various localities, as to his frame of mind in his last hours, it is thought that the subjoined extracts from two letters may prove interesting to many of your readers. The first was written, two weeks before his death, as an apology for missing an appointment to the negroes at Spring Hill, Jefferson Co.

The second, (to his beloved brother, Gen. J. P. Drake, of Indianapolis,) not more than thirty-six hours previous to his departure.

The calm, unshaken, unruffled confidence in Him in whom he had trusted; the steady eye, and firm step with which he met the advance of the last enemy, mark the man of God who has fought the good fight, and is ready to be offered up."

Magnolia Springs, April, 22, 1860.

DEAR BROTHER:—I am very sorry to miss my appointment to day, to the colored society at Spring Hill. In addition to the pleasure of preaching to the poor, I had promised myself a visit to you, and to Bro. Robertson. But I have to submit, I have been worse for some days with my chest disease. I know not what to call it—disease of the heart I have but little doubt. But I still persisted in the purpose to go. My horse was saddled, and I on the point of leaving yesterday evening, when the pain, and paralyzing feeling became so great, I gave up the trip.—It is the first time that I have backed out for this disease. It is a solemn crisis in my history; it would seem the great head of the Church is about to lay me aside. Good is his will; I will try to acquiesce; I know he can do without me; his workmen fall by the thousand, but still his work goes on. I pray for grace that I may glorify Him in affliction. I feel a remarkable peace this morning, and resignation to God's will. I ask your prayers, the prayers of sister Folks, and sister Scott, that I may be preserved in perfect submission to the Divine will, and that I may glorify Him, whether in life or death. I feel much better this morning, but think I had best keep quiet, at least for this day. **

If able, I shall leave for the upper part of my district, the latter part of next week. Shall be gone nearly three weeks. I may be able to call on my return.

B. M. DRAKE.

P. S. I have an appointment for Union Chapel, for next Sunday.

Magnolia Springs, May, 6th, 1860.
My DEAR PERRY.—I have two little boys home with me, one twelve the other fourteen.—Perry and Margruder. They enjoy each others society as much I think as I ever saw brothers. They sleep together, eat together, play together, and seem almost to live in each others' life. One cannot go on the shortest errand, without the other following immediately after him. They are never too tired to bear each other company. To me it is beautiful and very refreshing. Day after day it brings up the memory of the past. I am again at our old homestead. The venerable and loved faces of our dear parents are seen. The earnest love I then felt for you steals over my heart afresh. I was almost animated by your spirit, was like your shadow, ever following you; no fatigue was accounted of, it but your presence was there; in the old school-house we sat still, by side studying the same lesson. Through the orchards, through the forests, over the hills, under the cliffs, beside the streams, we walked side by side. The night watches were prevented by our lengthened conversations which we could not complete by day. Days, weeks, months, years, passed away in this pleasant boyish fraternity. The vision comes over my heart now, like a spell: visions of joys that are past, mournful though pleasing. How I rejoice that no dark cloud has ever obscured that bright vision; no envy, no jealousy, no malice, no coldness, has ever chilled hearts so united. How often have I grieved that our paths were so divergent, that we have seen so little of each other. But so it is, and we must submit.

When we last parted, I gave you what amounted to a promise, that if spared I would visit you. This thought I have cherished with much pleasure, but now there seems but little prospect of its realization. When I saw you, I told you of a threatening disease in my chest, then supposed to be some affection of the heart. It has increased until I am now subject to spasms which threaten immediate death. When the attack passes off which seldom lasts more than 20 or 30 minutes, I am tolerably comfortable. I am now for the first time detained from the duties of my district, by this increasing malady. Some of the doctors think it neuralgia of the heart, but seem to think it may be relieved. This is certain; if it gets much worse, it will be fatal; and it has been increasing all the time. My appetite is good, and my appearance as usual. Sometimes I feel nothing of it and feel quite well. It does not depress my spirits, save while the pain is excruciating. I rejoice to say I look at death without terror, and though I should be pleased to see my children reared and educated, and do a little more in the cause of my Divine Master, I think I can say from the heart, good is the will of my heavenly Father. Looking back on my past life, I have no regrets for any sacrifice I have made in the cause of religion. Forty-one years of toil have been already paid with so many blessings, that I am thankful I have been counted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ.

I would not give my hopes of a heavenly inheritance for the most magnificent estate ever got together by a mortal. I believe I have been a happier man than if I had been the most successful lawyer, planter, doctor, or politician in the land.

I shall leave an inheritance of poverty to my children, but I had rather leave that with the example of a Christian life, than millions without it.

The mystic tie so long unbroken in our family is now rent by the departure of Silas. John too has lost the companion of his age. How I pity him! But Heaven grows brighter as earth grows dimmer.

What a blessed fraternity is forming around our much loved parents as friend after friend departs! "There all the ship's company meet. Who sailed with the Saviour below."

I should be very glad to hear from you once more.

Your affectionate brother,
B. M. DRAKE.

POLITICAL NEWS.

VIENNA, Oct. 17.—The Emperor of Austria has referred to the Council of Ministers an address from the Bishops of the Austrian Empire, protesting against the new concordat. The Emperor reproves the Austrian Bishops for the adoption of a paper so liable to create public excitement when tranquillity is indispensable for the restoration of the country, and he takes occasion to remind them that the Emperor of Austria is a constitutional prince as well as a true son of the Church.

PARIS, October 17.—The Council of Ministers was held yesterday, at St. Cloud, the Emperor presiding. The result of its deliberations was a resolution that France should immediately intervene for the settlement of the Roman question, but without acting longer in conjunction with the Italian Government.

The Moniteur reproaches Italy for violating the laws of nations, disregarding the obligations of solemn treaties and fostering the dangerous spirit of republicanism. Bonaparte depressed. Rentes declining.

FLORENCE, Oct. 17.—News from the South continues favorable to the party of action. The Garibaldians have taken possession of the town of Nevoia, in the Papal States where they have entrenched themselves, and await the arrival of other bands to increase their numbers sufficiently to enable them to make further advances. Signor Acarbi, one of the deputies to the Italian Parliament, is commander-in-chief of the insurgents in that quarter of the Roman territory.

FLORENCE, Oct. 17.—Later advices from the South report that many fights have taken place between the invaders and the Papal troops with various results. PARIS, Oct. 17.—The Moniteur asserts that the inhabitants of the city of Rome and of the Papal provinces are loyal to the Pope, and only need assistance to drive the Italian invaders from their soil.

LONDON, Oct. 17.—The Times says Rattazzi must order the national troops to Rome, and anticipate the arrival there of both the Garibaldi volunteers and the regular troops of France. The Times declares the boldest policy is the best policy for Italy, and advises her to seize Rome and treat with France.

VIENNA, Oct. 17.—The reply of the Emperor to the Austrian Bishops was received with cheers in the Diet.

The Riechsrath has passed the organic law.

LONDON, Oct. 17.—It is reported that Prussia and Russia have demanded the session of Crete to Greece.

WASHINGTON, October 17.—After eighteen months' labor the General Land Office has completed duplicates of the public land records destroyed during the war.

It is hoped that on the meeting of Congress the land offices will be filled, when the records will be forwarded. Those for Louisiana are said to be perfect.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17.—Vallandigham is prominently mentioned as Wade's successor.

At the request of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Attorney General has promulgated an opinion which closes as follows:

"Neither railroads owned by a State or the gross earnings thereof, or the profits accumulated therefrom, or the dividends paid upon its bonds, nor articles manufactured by convict labor in the Penitentiary of a State for the use of that State, or on account of the State, are subject to taxation either under the act of 1864 or any other of the internal revenue acts."

CINCINNATI, Oct. 21.—The Enquirer presents the name of Geo. H. Pendleton as the choice of the Democracy of Ohio, Kentucky and the Northwest, for next President, upon the platform of the Constitution, equal justice to all sections of our common country, with equality to all and special privileges to none; the same currency for the bondholders that the people are compelled to receive; the prompt payment of the public debt as it falls due in the legal tender of the nation, the immediate restoration of the Southern States to the Union, with their full share of representatives in both branches of the Government guaranteed by the Constitution, and universal amnesty for all political offenses.

THAT NEGRO JURY

That member of the jury who derives support from what he styles the "place whar the fever comes from" was taken to task about allowing his name to be used. The following is his reply:

"Boss, I wut political, dem odder niggers wout speak to me—but what's I gwine to do? I don't have nothin to do wid politics, but I'm drawn on the jury. Now, it's my dooty. And I allers does my dooty." The Grand Inquest of the parish is now on its mighty rounds. Using the language of another of the down-trodden, newly enfranchised citizens, "She's agwine to go a bulgin."

Having exhausted himself in charging the Grand Jury on a law, dead these ten years, Thomas has not appeared since.

MOBILE GRAND JURY.—We learn by the Mobile papers, of the 16th inst., that Justice was duly invested with a civic crown the day previous, such as she wears here. The following black and tan Grand Jury having been empaneled:

Whites.—A. E. Buck, C. T. Stearns, Wiley B. Brown, G. W. Wilcox, O. J. Paine, L. Kennedy, J. Keiruan, T. S. Terney, C. Fernandez.

Negroes.—L. S. Berry, E. D. Taylor, James Bragg, Emanuel Madried, J. D. Taylor, William Littell, J. H. Palmer, Albert Gallatin.

The Times, referred to it, says:

The whites on it are not known, or little known, or too much known.

ITALIAN NEWS.

The Italian troops on the Papal frontier have been reinforced and increased efforts are made to guard the whole line.

Italy is greatly excited at the threat of French intervention.

Reports from Rome on Friday, say that a fierce fight had taken place at Verola, during which the Papal troops recaptured the town. The Garibaldians suffered heavy loss.

All official journals say within twenty-four hours Italy must announce her determination to support a revolutionary movement on Rome, or to execute the September Convention; and France must decide peace or war accordingly.

A petition signed by 12,000 Romans has been presented to the Pope by the Roman City Council, headed by Senators of Rome, praying his Holiness to allow Italian troops to occupy Rome.

Special telegrams from Florence describe the Roman situation as more serious. Eight Italian iron clads have been ordered to the coast.

It is reported that a revolution broke out in Rome on Friday night, and the excitement at Florence is very great.

FLORENCE, October 21.—Reports that Garibaldi has disappeared from the Island of Capri are reiterated, and seem to meet with no contradiction. Rattazzi has resigned, and will be succeeded by Gen. Alenabrea. Some bands of insurgents remain in the Papal territory. The evacuation is not as complete as was previously reported.

PARIS, Oct. 21.—No answer has yet been returned by Italy to Napoleon's ultimatum.

LONDON, Oct. 21.—The Italian situation is better. It is said Italy will satisfy the demands of France. Transportation of troops to Toulon has been stopped.

Those ready to sail have disembarked. French war preparations countermanded. General Cialdini succeeds Rattazzi as Prime Minister. He will form a new Cabinet, whose policy will be anti-revolutionary.

ROME, October 19.—The French Minister informed the Pope in the name of Napoleon, that whatever might happen the aid of France to maintain the Pope's temporal power would not fail. The garrison of Rome has been reinforced.

Toulon, Oct. 21.—Gen. Dumont has arrived. Troops are now embarking in six ships including two iron clads.

PARIS, Oct. 21.—The Moniteur is silent in reference to preparations for intervention. L'Eclair says everything is ready at Toulon for the expedition to Rome, but the der to go is withheld until the ception of Italy's final reply, which may be delayed some hours on account of the Ministerial crisis in Florence.

Another corps d'armee will be prepared to operate in another direction. La France says it is certain, in event, that French troops will arrive at Rome before Italian.

The Patrie publishes a telegram that 20,000 troops have been sent from Lyons to Toulon.

It is stated that the Italian Government declares itself powerful to arrest the bands of the invaders or to protect the Holy See.

PARIS, Oct. 21.—Evening.—French fleet, with troops, intended for Rome, has left Toulon.

PARIS, Oct. 22.—Noon.—Moniteur announces definitely the expedition to Italy has been countermanded, because pledges herself to observe treaty.

The Italian people, supposing that the new ministry will be in the interest of Napoleon, pouring in petitions protesting against the desertion of the national cause by the Government. Reports from the Papal States are conflicting.

If the Emperor of the French looking about for a good opening to begin a universal war, his Christian Majesty can certainly it in the present affair of Italy. The Holy Father is beleaguered set upon by those who have him longest, and lived nearest the Vatican. His Mercenary troops are sorely pressed by thousands of good Catholics, who have taken up arms rid themselves of the government of the Church. Right under eves of St. Peter are the Dangers of the Inquisition of the Dominicans and not far off the Holy College of the Jesuits. To destroy those monsters of the Holy Roman Empire, the people are willing to go for a while all the "advances" secular, and ecclesiastical. Cardinal Antonelli has to they are willing to shed their blood and die under the blows of the Church of Rome.

The secular power of this Bishopric, is regarded as essential to its vitality by all the Orders of Catholics. They doubtless rally all the power throughout Europe, that can rally to its support. For nately, the greatest power of Europe cannot be dragged into support of a prince that has systematically given to political interference. England, Prussia are Protestant, and is of the Greek Church; and we are not to be moved by any appeal of the Disciples of Christ into the support, or defense ecclesiastical system that has en itself soul and body in keeping of the most conservative, industrious body of men ever banded together under the style of a Holy Order. It dominant, exacting Order, having grasped the Roman and government, has rendered insupportable to its inhabitants defense comes at all for the it must come from France tria. Countries where the Scriptures are not read by the mon people, may be blindly the work of fastening upon the shackles of Darkness; but bare attempt may end in the throw of the house of Hapsburg and in opening all Europe to preaching of Christ, and the nation of the word of God.

Since writing the above, the following Italian item by graph. The trouble is rather than concluded.

seat was never vacant without sufficient cause; a slight indisposition, a cloudy atmosphere or fatigue from her abundant labors were not urged as reasons for absence.

In times of revival she might be found at the side of penitents, with encouraging words, and fervent prayers, directing them to the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world."

The different pastors in charge of Moreau, will often recall with grateful emotions, the recollection of her assiduous care for their welfare. She always anticipated the wants of their wardrobes—was ever ready to comfort them in distress, and when sick she ministered to them with her own hands, and watched at their bedside with the sleepless solicitude of a mother; regardless of fatigue, or exposure to infection. Even when sick herself with her final and painful illness, she never lost sight of the necessities of her pastor.—The Sabbath school in which she had been a faithful and zealous teacher for more than twenty years, owes much of its success and prosperity to her influence and labors.
Upon the pupils of her class, she left the impression of her christian character, and from these the superintendent was constantly drafting to recruit the corps of teachers—a number of them yet remain in this useful occupation to realize the incalculable advantage of her instructions, some are in-laboring in desolate wastes, in obscure and retired portions of their Master's vineyard far from the scenes of their early training, others have sunk to rest on those quiet beds, where sweet repose shall seal their eyes till the morning of eternity shall unclasp the fetters of death and chase away the cold gloom of the grave forever.

The "Orphans Home" of which she was one of the founders, and for which she had labored with the most unflagging energy for the past fifteen years in the various capacities of Treasurer, Vice President and President, occupied much of her time and thoughts; and the heart of many orphans sought for and found in the haunts of poverty and destitution, will swell with emotions of non-terrible gratitude as the full tide of memory bears back the recollection of that generous countenance which beamed with such maternal tenderness upon their friendless desolation. The poor found in her an angel of mercy—instead of being coldly turned from her door with a small pittance, as is the usual custom, if her keen perception assured her that they were real objects of destitution, they were invited into the hall or sitting-room, where their tales of distress were patiently listened too, and plans were devised, whenever practicable, for more permanent relief.— Even during her illness and when suffering intensely, the sickness and destitution of a poor widow, who accidentally came to her knowledge, deprived her of rest till something was done for her relief. She said "I could not sleep last night, I was so troubled, thinking, if I suffer so much with all the comforts I have, and so many friends round me, what must that poor creature suffer in her lonely and comfort-less condition." Such was her care for the welfare of her servants, and such the reciprocal attachment, that amid all the social disarrangements resulting from emancipation, they remained true and faithful and rewarded her kindness by their presence and attention during her last illness, stood weeplingly round her unconscious form when cold in death, and followed her remains to their final resting place.

Of all the excellencies of which we have spoken, none shone more conspicuously than those which shed their light upon the domestic circle. Her home was blessed with order, brightened with cheerfulness, hallowed with piety, and sweetened with home-born enjoyments. To her husband she was like some heavenly star shining upon all the pathway of life; she shared his cares, soothed his sorrows, studied his interests, and sweetened his retirement by a winning tenderness and wealth of affection with which she habitually adorned herself.

In her last and protracted illness, her patience and cheerful resignation, shed a mild and lovely hue over the more brilliant aspects of a life so luxuriant of fruitfulness—of the setting sun on some cloudless day, sends back a light that seems tinged with the golden hues of some other sphere, with which he softens his imperial sheen, so did the light of this lovely saint, slowly descending to the horizon of life, seem to blend its departing rays with "Gleams from the morning lit land." For some months before her death, the greatest struggle seemed to be, to repress an impatience to depart and be at rest. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered at times, in her room where a few friends came to join in the blessed memorial of our Saviour's death; she was on such occasions greatly refreshed; her soul seemed to be borne away on the wings of faith, to the enjoyment of "the substance of things hoped for," the half lifted curtain of the future, seemed to reveal those visions of light.

"Which border the river of death." Two weeks before her death, and just as the family were assembling for morning prayers, we were summoned to her chamber, by the announcement that she was dying. She had fainted, and when we reached her she was still struggling for breath, but her countenance was expressive of the most ecstatic joy, her soul seemed to have plumed its wings for the eternal flight, and she was in a blaze of rapture at the prospect, she broke forth into an eloquent strain of thanksgiving and praise, as she often did at other times.

A female friend who often communed with her during her sickness says

Her mind was uniformly calm. Her peace seemed "to flow as a river." The Bible was the "man of her counsel." As long as she was able, she took delight in reading its sacred pages, and when her sight became dim, so that she could no longer read for herself, she embraced every opportunity of getting others to search for her the sacred scriptures. At one time on being asked if there was any particular chapter she would like to have read, she replied, "No, it is all precious." Her friend then turned to the 14th of John, thinking it would be appropriate. She listened with the most intense interest, and at its conclusion, remarked "If I had made a selection this morning it would have been that chapter, for every verse seems to apply to me;" and then related the following circumstance connected with it. Some years ago when in a great deal of sorrow and affliction, and scarcely knowing where to look for advice or comfort, I went to my room and kneeling down with my Bible in my hand, I prayed, "O Lord reveal to me the path of duty, let me know what thou wouldest have me do under these trying circumstances." I then opened my Bible and the first words that my eyes fell upon were these "let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me." I then exclaimed, it is enough, with such a source of comfort I will go forth in the discharge of duty; and by the grace of God, I will bear the cross and if need be endure the shame.

On one occasion during her illness she was slightly attacked with paralysis, and for some time was unable to articulate distinctly or to connect words into sentences, but the first words she uttered when the power of speech was restored were praises to God for his goodness and mercy and exhortations to all around to love and serve Him. She had led such an active and useful life, that even while confined to her sick room, she longed for opportunities of doing good. When it was suggested that her patience and resignation were exerting silent influence on those who visited her, she replied if God is glorified, I am willing to suffer. In any way, I am willing to honor Him in my yes.

Resolutions passed at a meeting of the Teachers of the Moreau Sabbath School in reference to Mrs. S. A. ROBERT-SON.

New Orleans, October, 5th 1867.
At a special meeting of the teachers of the Moreau Sunday-school, held this evening, Dr. J. W. Adams in the chair, and S. H. Schroeder, Secretary. The following preamble and resolutions were adopted: Whereas, It has pleased our Heavenly Father to call home from his labors and sufferings here, to the sweet rest of Heaven our loved friend and fellow-teacher, Mrs.
SARAH A. ROBERTSON.

Therefore, Resolved, That we deeply feel that we have lost in her a most faithful and efficient teacher, whose example, precept, and influence, in the Sabbath school for the last twenty years have been of incalculable benefit.
Resolved, That, as a band of teachers we will endeavor to imitate her virtues and follow in her footsteps to "That land of pure delight Where souls immortal reign."

Resolved, That we do most sincere sympathize with the relatives of the deceased, and especially with our beloved and revered superintendent, her husband.
Resolved, That as a last tribute of affection and respect to her memory, we request our pastor to deliver at his earliest convenience, a discourse upon the life and ob-literation of the deceased.

Resolved, That these resolutions be read to the Sabbath-school, a copy be preserved to the family, and a copy be sent to the ADVOCATE for publication.

Died in New Orleans, September 2th 1867, at the residence of his parents, RICHARD SALTER LANE, born in this city, March 9th, 1866, and infant child of John Jay Lane and Alice Lan.

Soft lie the turf on thy tomb.
May its verdure like emeralds be;
There should not be a shadow of gloom
In sight that reminds us of thee.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

TRUE RICHES.

Some little folks went out to tea,
At 69 Miller Square, And buns and cake, and marmalade, Adorned the table there.

They shipped their tea from tiny cans Of China, white and gold, And some a dozen times were filled, So little did they hold!

And Polly put the sugar in,
And Lucy poured the milk;
And puss sat with them in a chair,
With skin as soft as silk.

Said Carrie Ritchie, as they laughed And talked that happy night—
"You haven't seen my necklace yet, With golden locket bright?"

"I never all my whole life long, Have felt so rich before; My grandma says she really thinks It cost three pound or more."

"I don't call that so very rich!" Tall Kitty Fuller cried;
"I have a handsome diamond ring, Aunt let me when she died."

Cried Minnie, "I've a lovely seal Of white cornelian—set In solid gold but dear papa Won't let me wear it yet."

Said laughing Jane, "I've more than all!
My good luck I may thank;
I think I've nearly twenty pounds Within the savings bank."

Then spoke the lady of the house—
"Be wealthy as you will,
If you have nothing more to boast, Ann Grey is richer still!"

Amazed, the widow's child they eyed,
In mourning dressed so plain; Without a trinket in the world Of which she might be vain.

"My dears," the lady said, (and smiled To see sweet Annie start.)
"True riches are not gems and gold, But Christ's love in the heart."

Poor Matt, the Idiot Boy.

A lady, wandering along the sea-cost of an English watering place, observed a boy intently gazing up at a small space between the clouds.
Drawing close to him, said she,
"What are you looking at, my boy?"
The child made no answer. "Boy, boy," said she shaking him gently by the sleeve, "what are you doing?" The boy sighed, rubbed his eyes, shaded them, looked up again, and said with earnestness, "Matt was looking for God. Matt wants to see God." The clouds closed, and, as if to comfort himself for the disappointment, he said in a more cheerful tone, "Matt shall see God some day."

At this time a little girl ran out of a cottage, calling out, "Matt come home; dinner is ready." The lady followed, and, being asked to walk in, she learned that Matt was an orphan, about thirteen years of age, living with an aunt and grandfather.

After this she often called, and one day found the old man ill. The clergyman shortly afterward came in, and read the eighteenth of Matthew. When he came to the parable of the "king that would take account of his servants," Matt's attention became riveted. When he had finished, Matt turned to him earnestly, saying, "Pardon, read some more." Mr. Green began to relate the parable thus: "A great king said (and in speaking he pointed upward), 'Bring my servants to me, and I will make them pay me all the money is paid.' The tears trickled down the poor boy's cheeks; his countenance showed great alarm, and, rushing to the breach, he threw himself down and wept piteously.

The next day the lady found him again in his usual attitude, looking up; and not until she noticed him did he notice her.

"What is Matt doing?" she asked.

"Matt was talking to God," he replied.

"What did poor Matt say?" The boy, joining hands, looked up with a piteous expression of submission and fear, and said, "Good God, Matt has no money to pay!" And then, shaking his head, he told her, with the deepest emotion, that he was going to be put in prison—God was going to put Matt in pris-son.

The lady, taking both his hands to fix his attention, said cheerfully, "Jesus Christ has paid for poor Matt. God will not put Matt in prison now. Jesus Christ has paid all for Matt."

An expression of wonder over-spread his countenance. He repeated over and over the comforting words, and sat down to hear them again and again. A long time did Matt sit in the shelter of a boat, silent—so long that his friend feared that, now his fears were calmed, he might have forgotten their cause; but not so; at length he arose, walked a few paces, and, lifting his arms and face to heaven, cried out in a loud, clear voice:

"Man that paid—man that paid—Matt says thank you, thank you!"
The grandfather died, and Matt was told that he went to God, and that God would soon send for him also. This took such possession of Matt's mind that he would ask for his new cap, and have his hands washed, that he might be ready when God would send for him.
"God would send for Matt some day," he repeated softly; "perhaps it would be to-day, and Matt must be ready; Matt must always be ready."

One day he inquired of the lady what kind of a place it was that God would take him to.

"It is never cold there," she said;
"no one will be hungry or sick."

"Will any one beat me there?"

"No; God will take care of Matt."

A gleam of joy stole over the vacant face, and he said, "Rob beats Matt now."

A time of trouble came—his aunt died—and poor Matt was found, one cold, snowy morning, nearly frozen to death in a cave, his dying voice uttering these words: "Matt shall see God some day. Matt will never be cold any more. God! God! and man that paid! Oh! take poor Matt away."

The young person who found him ran for assistance, but before Matt was removed, the spirit had passed away.

Happy Matt! Yes, reader, the poor idiot boy was happy, for he had laid hold upon the gospel message that Jesus paid the debt of sin.

The mystery of mysteries is folded up in these words, "God manifested in the flesh."

The man who paid the costly price of ransom for the prisoner was the Son of God. Jesus was bound, scourged, crucified. The forfeiture of life was the sentence against the prisoner. This was the penalty, and Jesus paid it to the full. He died for sinners. O reader! will you not give Jesus the glory of being your Saviour? Will you not come and taste the joy of a present salvation? and then you will be able to look forward and upward with assurance that God will take you also some day, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." *The Wre-

FARM AND GARDEN.

From the American Agriculturist.

Earth Closets vs. Water Closets.

The manure waste of civilization are vastly greater than those of savage or nomadic life. Even on most farms we lose more or less ashes, bones, and other valuable fertilizers. Much of value escapes from the fermenting manure heaps, much is washed away, while four-fifths of all human soil and liquid is lost; and we think if we were to say nine-tenths, we should be nearer the truth. In the cities almost the whole is virtually lost, and were the system of water closets, now so much in vogue, to extend, all would be washed out to sea. Among savages and wandering tribes, the waste is left upon the surface of the ground, or slightly buried, and so the earth is not robbed to benefit the ocean. The manurial value of the sewage of cities, which is emptied into the rivers and flows out to sea, consists chiefly in the urine and soil of the inhabitants. A great reform has been commenced in England in regard to this subject, and the long known deodorizing and purifying effects of dry earth are systematically applied not only to rendering human excrements inof-fensive, but at the same time preserving them for manure, in a form which may be economically transported many miles. This principle has been already explained in the Agriculturist, but the way of operating the "earth closets" was not described, the closets being a source of profit to somebody, and hence involved in a little mystery.

A Sewage Congress has lately been held at Leamington, England, and at this meeting a paper was read by a Mr. James, in regard to some simple closets which have been introduced upon the estate of the Jewish banker, Baron Rothschild, at Halton. These consist of simple boxes or shallow, tight vaults, which receive the soil and liquid of the family, and into which, at evening, enough thoroughly dried earth is thrown to cover all, being about a pound and a half per day to each adult. This quantity is found to be sufficient to deodorize the soil and absorb the liquid. The accumulations, when these boxes and vaults become full, are dried in the sun without any unpleasant odor, and when dried and pulverized, may be used again and again, the substance becoming a more concentrated form of manure with each repetition.— The author of the paper alludes to the natural instincts of animals, cats for example, and to the instructions of the great Jewish lawgiver to his people, (Deut. xxiii, 12 and 13,) as both precept and example in favor of using dry earth in this way. The advantages claimed are, increased cleanliness, freedom from bad odors, that the waters of wells are not contaminated by privy vaults in the vicinity, that brooks and rivers are not rendered too impure for valuable fish to frequent them, that the closets may be in the house, without offence, and the saving of great quantities of valuable manure.

These seem to be strong and rather startling propositions, but the writer is able to cite his own experience during the heat and wet of the past summer, to corroborate many of the claims of the advocates of earth closets in England. A privy was built with a simple draw of 2 inch planks, well put together, and on runners set beneath the seats, and the deposits kept constantly covered with sun-dried, and sifted garden soil, which entirely suppresses all odors. We have not thought it necessary to re-dry the earth, as fresh soil must be more easily prepared; besides, fresh earth is a more agreeable substance to handle, if one is inclined to humor his prejudices, as most of us are.— We secure in this way a rich and concentrated manure, though proportionally more bulky than if passed several times through the closet.
This manure is free from weed seeds of course, and may be applied immediately, or, if desired, dried and kept under cover a long time.

From the American Agriculturist.

Improvement of Land by Grazing.

If the soil can have all its crops returned to it in kind, or in the shape of manure made from feeding them to animals upon it, it will constantly improve. A worn-out soil left to grow up to forest will recover its fertility in due time.— Cows pastured decline in productiveness because the cows are usually yarded at night, and a large part of the manure, as well as milk and calves, is removed from the soil. It is different with the grazing of bees or of fattening sheep.— Where the object is to make beef for market, bullocks of three or four years of age are bought in the spring in good condition, and turned into the pasture as soon as the grass is sufficiently grown to support them, and are sold off in the fall. It is considered a matter of great importance by graziers that the pasture should be large, and should have only so many cattle as it can carry through the season. It has been found in experience that the changing of beehives from one pasture to another has a bad influence upon them. They become restless and lose flesh. In many districts where ground plaster does well, it is sown at the rate of a bushel or two to the acre every spring. Even in this small quantity the effect is often astonishing, bringing in white clover, and on pastures where it has not been applied before, it will sometimes increase the feed four-fold. With this cheap dressing and grazing beehives, many run down farms have been brought up to a high degree of productiveness. Some boast that their meadows will carry a bullock to the acre. With good judgment in buying and selling, this is an easy way of getting rent from land. The stock require very little attention after they are turned into the pasture, until the drover comes in the fall, or they are otherwise marketed.

Sheep are said to improve land more rapidly than bullocks. The manure is more evenly distributed if the land is level; and if it is broken, the most of it is dropped where it is most needed, upon the tops of the knolls. They also crop bushes much more closely than beehives, but in order to keep brush under, all the brush should be cut with the sickle at the start, and the pasture should be heavily stocked as long as the sprouts push. In Harrison County, Ohio, and in other parts of the State, where the winter wheat has become an uncertain crop, we are informed that many of the farmers have resorted to wool as a substitute. This crop has several important advantages over wheat. It involves much less labor, and improves, rather than exhausts the soil. It is found that the sheep pastures are growing more productive. Wool at fifty cents a pound can be carried to market profitably, much farther than wheat at the ordinary prices.
A pound of wheat is now worth but three or four cents, and freight on grain is about as expensive as on wool. The latter, moreover, is one of the few products of the farm that can be held over without serious risk of loss. Some of the finest wool in the State is produced in this County, and has been sold from fifty to sixty cents a pound this season. In considering the question of abandoning sheep husbandry, as some may be tempted to do, under temporary reverses or falling prices, we think due credit should be given to sheep as improvers of the soil. The farmer can hardly grow poor whose soil is constantly growing rich.

SCIENTIFIC.

The Mont Cenis Summit Railroad.

We have already noticed the completion of this great work of engineering, and the success of a trial trip made over the line a few weeks since. An English exchange furnishes us with the following interesting particulars additional to the brief cable announcement we previously published:

"A train, composed of an engine and two carriages, left the St.
Michel station at 6:30 A. M., on the 21st of August. The morning was almirably adapted for the trip, the sun shining with great brilliancy upon the Alpine peaks and the numerous glaciers which are visible in different parts of the route.

"After leaving the deep valley in which St. Michel is situated, the line passes by a gradient of one in thirty to the Pont de la Denise, where an iron bridge spans the river Areq, near the site of that which was carried away by the inundations of last year. As the little train passed the village of Fourneau, the workmen of the Grand Tunnel of the Alps turned out en masse, and, as at all other parts of the route, they were observed stooping down, and even endangering their lives for the purpose of inspecting the unusual mechanism of the engine for working on the central rail. The first very steep gradient, of one in twelve, was seen in passing Modane, and, foreshortened to the view, appeared on the approach as if impossible to surmount; but the engine, the second constructed on this system, had already proved equal to the task on the experimental line, and, eluding the central rail between its horizontal wheels, it glided quickly up, under a pressure of steam not more than eighty pounds to the square inch, without apparent effort.

The progress was purposely slow, because no engine or carriage had previously passed over the line, and also to give opportunity for examining the works. The damages done on which the line was chiefly laid were found to be substantial—repaired by the French government. The magnificent scenery around, and the waterfall near Fort Sessillon, were much admired, as the sharp curves afforded different views, while passing on the edges of the deep ravines. The train entered Lauslebourg Station under a triumphal arch, having accomplished twenty-four miles of distance, and attained an elevation of two thousand one hundred feet above St. Michel. From this point the zigzags of ascent commenced, and the gradients over a distance of our miles were for the most part one in twelve. Looking down from the train near the summit, as if from a balloon, four of the zigzags were visible at the same instant to a depth of two thousand feet. The power of the engine was satisfactorily tested in this ascent, and the summit was reached under salvaof artillery from an improvised battery, and amid the cheers of French and Italians who had gathered to welcome the English on the frontier.

The engine came to a stand under a triumphal arch, at an elevation of 7,000 feet above the sea. Flags of the three nations, and a silk flag specially presented by Signor Ginelli to Mr. Fell, waves over a sumptuous breakfast, also provided by that gentleman. The hospice, the lake, and the plateau of the summit, surrounded by snow-clad peaks and glaciers, rising to an elevation of from 10,000 feet to 13, 000 feet were passed, and the portion of the descent commenced from the Grand Croix. The railway here follows the old Napoleon Road, which was abandoned long since for diligence traffic on account of the dangers from avalanches.— Masonry-covered ways of extraordinary strength had here been speedily provided for the railway.
Thedescend to Susa was a series of the sharpest gradients, on which the central rail had been continuously laid. The valley of the Don, with Susa and the convent of San Michel, and even the Superga above Turin, visible for thirty miles in the distance, presented a magnificent panorama as the train wound through a clear atmosphere round the mountain side. The confidence of the party was manifested by their crowding round all parts of the engine and they thoroughly enjoyed the ever changing scenes as they passed round the edges of the precipices Susa was entered amid the acclamations of multitudes of spectators. Thus was completed a journey unexampled in its character, both as respects the steepness of gradients, the elevation of the summit level, and the difficulty with which the curves and precipices were overcome."

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

We have but little variation to notice in the general market since our last issue. Fair receipts of Western Produce and the execution of occasional orders from the interior have caused some little vitality in certain branches of trade, but, as a general thing, there has been no real improvement in business, which continues depressed by the prevalence of the epidemic and the consequent postponement of the country demand, which usually revives at about this period. Our leading staple is in fair request but at prices below the views of factors, who give way reluctantly to the influence of depressing news. Operations in Sugar and Molasses have been confined to retail transactions. There has been more enquiry for Tobacco, resulting in moderate sales at full prices. The movement in Western Produce has been of about the usual extent, and generally at figures rather more in favor of sellers.

The weather has continued warm in the sun, but with chilly North winds, cool nights and frequent showers. It is a vexed question whether the epidemic shows any signs of abatement or not. There seems to have been a decrease both in cases and mortality in the Second and Third Districts, but an increase of the disease in the First and Fourth. We hope to witness a decided improvement towards the close of the month. Our accounts from the interior present the same diverse character as those previously noticed.

COTTON.—We notice in our last report that the market closed so nearly at a standstill that we had no basis for quotations, which we accordingly omitted, but that it was evident factors were willing to meet the demand at some concessions rates of 20 to 21c for Good Ordinary, 22½ to 23½ for Low Middling, and 25c for Middling. There was no material change on Wednesday, but as factors offered their supplies quite freely, buyers came forward and took 400 bales at prices showing great irregularity, and generally increased weakness. On Thursday there was a fair enquiry early in the day, but, as factors were unwilling to make any further concessions, buyers subsequently withdrew, and the business was confined to 200 bales, at about Wednesday's rates. Yesterday the market opened with but few indications of any movement, and after the receipt of the Liverpool dispatches referred to, became nearly stagnant, buyers demanding further concessions, which factors would not admit. Under these circumstances the sales were only 150 bales, while prices showed increased weakness.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 750 bales, making a total for the week of 1425 against 1074 last week, and 1225 the week before.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 807 bales, against 1771 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 928 bales.

With the remark that there is a good deal of irregularity in prices, and that it is difficult to give regular quotations, we now modify our figures as follows:

|---------------|----------|
| Low | 16 to 18 |
| Ordinary | 18 to 20 |
| Good Ordinary | 19 to 21 |
| Low Middling | 21 to 23 |
| Middling | 23 to 25 |

Tobacco.—We have to note a little better feeling in this market since our last review. The supply offering is light, and factors have continued firm in their rates. There has been some enquiry on the part of buyers, resulting in sales of 132 hogsheads, of which 10 hogsheads were at 6½c, 1 at 6, 43 at 10c, 18 at 11c, 2 and 2 at 12c, 5 at 13c, 31 at 15c, and 20 at 18c per lb. This makes a total for the week of about 180 hogsheads taken partly by the city trade and partly for shipment. Holders are now asking the following quotations:

| | | | |
|------------------|----------|----------|----------|
| Light | 4 to 5 | Heavy | 5 to 6 | | Common ref'd | 5 to 6 | 5 to 6 | 5 to 6 |
| Prime | 6 to 7 | 6 to 7 | 6 to 7 |
| Prime and choice | 7 to 8 | 7 to 8 | 7 to 8 | | Common Leaf | 7 to 8 | 7 to 8 | 7 to 8 | | Medium | 8 to 10 | 8 to 10 | 8 to 10 | | Good | 10 to 12 | 10 to 12 | 10 to 12 |
| Prime | 12 to 15 | 12 to 15 | 12 to 15 |
| Choice | 15 to 18 | 15 to 18 | 15 to 18 |
| Choice Selects | 18 to 20 | 18 to 20 | 18 to 20 |

FLOUR.—The market has been quiet but very firm since our last review. Several buyers have been looking around for large lots, but not much has been done as holders refused to make any concessions whatever.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.

The next session of this Institution commences on the 19th September, 1867. As evidence of her success as an educator of young men, she points to her graduates all over the South. No location surpasses this in point of health. The town of Boynton and surrounding country has but one physician, and he is not half employed. In addition to the schools of Moral Philosophy, Ancient Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Modern Languages, we have also a school of Commercial Science, in which are taught the branches of a business education. Young men attend any schools they wish, and get a showing for whatever they accomplish. It is our intention hereafter, to fill up our vacancies with a special session, so that young men can review any studies they wish, but more particularly to teach English grammar, Commercial Arithmetic, Book-keeping, Penmanship, and Commercial Law. Thus, our students can take the Literary and Scientific course during the session, and get a practical instruction in business during the vacations. The Special Session in vacation covers the heated term in the South when business is over, and young men already engaged in business can come here to perfect their knowledge of Commercial Science, and return to the South in time to resume business.

Expenses for ten months, including meals, use of furniture, (averaged) fuel, lights, washing, matriculation and contingent fee, tuition in three schools, so as to occupy the student's whole time—$300, one-half payable at the commencement of each term.

A daily line of hacks, Sundays excepted, runs from Alenoke station (Richmond & Danville Railroad) to Boynton. Send for circulars.

Jerusalem, exulting
On that sacred shore, I hope thee, wish thee, sing thee,
And love thee evermore!
I ask not for my merit:
I seek not to deny
My merit is destruction, A child of wrath am I:
But yet with Faith I venture And hope upon my way;
For those perennial gardens I labor night and day.
The Best and Dearest Father Who made me and Who saved, Bore with me in dejection,
And from dejection loved:
When in His strength I struggle, For very joy I leap,
When in my sin I totter, I weep, or try to weep;
And grace, sweet grace celestial, Shall all its love display, And David's Royal Fountain Purge every sin away.
O mine, my golden Syon!
O lovelier far than gold!
With laurel girt battlements, And safe victorious fold:
O sweet and blessed Country, Shall I ever see thy face?
O sweet and blessed Country, Shall I ever win thy grace?
I have the hope within me To comfort and to bless!
Shall I ever win the prize I seek?
O tell me, tell me, Yes!
Exult, O dust and ashes!
The Lord shall be thy part:
His only, His for ever,
Thou shalt be, and thou art!
Exult, O dust and ashes!
The Lord shall be thy part:
His only, His for ever,
Thou shalt be, and thou art!

BRAZIL.

The emigrants, how are they Doing who are in Brazil?

Some are doing well, the large Majority I think, but some are doing badly and are discouraged, and some few of them wish they were back in their native land.
That the emigrant to this country goes with many trials and dis-arrangements, it would be folly to say. But, I really think, the greatest source of trouble is the language; one cannot realize until he tries it, how embarrassing it is. To be dependent on others to do all your talking, as much as if you were dumb, and all to come upon you suddenly, and then to remember that all you meet are strangers, strangers in language, in features, religion, and in many of the customs of daily life, and to feel the same time, that 6000 miles ocean roll between you, and your native land—put all these together, and no wonder that they are sad and despondent, and wish they were at home again in the States, surrounded with old lands, and familiar scenes, and with the sweet sounds of their native tongue.

But dear reader, while all these things are there, yet I am sure a majority of those who came from the South, are pleased, well satisfied with their new homes—and strangers as we are, in a strange land, many of us have found friends, and practical. Here is an example. When the unfortunate Mullen, 160 in number, landed they were without a dollar.
He had suffered shipwreck on the coast of Cuba, in February and carried from thence to New York, on a ship chartered by agent of the Brazilian Government, and from New York sent to this port, where they were without money, and many were sick, and almost destitute of clothing. When this case became known to a certain Brazilian gentleman of this city, he called on some of his acquaintances, and communicated all the facts to them, instructed by them, he called on them, the 160 emigrants, for one year, and these soon off for their new homes, in the interior. But of that number, there were two brothers, who preferred to seek a home on the coast among the older settlements, and with funds and credit from the same generous friend, they selected a home and went to work, and here is the result thus far.

While sitting in the stone house of the firm alluded to, a gentleman entered, who was greeted with great cordiality—and was introduced to me as one of the two brothers. His hands were hard, and his face sunburned, but he was the most cheerful man I have seen for many a day. He told me he was delighted with his home, that he found the Brazilians of the better class, the kindest neighbors he had ever known, and he found plenty of good laborers among the poor, and as the fruit of their toils thus far, he had brought up to the city with him, 100 bags of choice coffee, prepared for market, since he went there in June, from his plantation; and moreover, he indulges the hope, that in 12 months he will be able to pay for his plantation entirely. He assured me he had no difficulty in procuring plenty of good hands, who worked from day-light until dark, at prices for men, ranging from 4 to 6 dollars per month. In other localities labor is scarcer, and dearer, but in many localities good laborers can be had for fair pay.

One great source of trouble is this, they come here with extravagant and unreasonable hopes, dreaming that lands, and houses, and servants, can be had almost for the asking. If they would come here with the hope of doing as well in their new, as in their old homes, from the States, I don't think one in 20, would be disappointed—provided, that good judgment is used in selecting their homes.

When they come here, let them avoid running about, to and fro over the land, and be not too hasty or impatient because the language is strange, and there seems to be no opening at first; and in a short time they will begin to find opportunities, for buying, or renting on good terms; and I believe in the majority of cases it is best to rent for a year.

There is one class of emigrants who had better stay where they are. They are those who come here cursing the Yankees, and think the more of this they do, the better it will be for them.
They soon find out that this won't pay. The better class here, are generally kind to us, and we have their sincere sympathy; but they don't appreciate all this swearing.
They seem to think it looks foolish at least, and it certainly won't buy fine estates, as some seem to think.

Again as a general rule those who are most given to this kind of swearing, are of the first to return to the States, after they get here and try this swearing process awhile, and have Portuguese jabbered at them in return, they soon begin to evince symptoms of home sickness. The reaction now sets in strongly, and they commence cursing Brazilians, the country they live in, and soon they who were so fierce against all Yankees are on their way back to the States, well prepared to become the most quiet and docile subjects of Yankee rule.

There is one class quite the opposite of the above, who are almost sure to stay in Brazil, contented and happy—I mean those who have seriously and prayer-fully considered the whole subject of emigration in all its bearings, and after free consultation with wife, and children, if these are old enough, have concluded that in view of the gloomy prospects in their native land, it is best to emigrate to Brazil. When such people come here they will stay, and thank God for this bright and favored land of refuge. And though they leave behind the graves of beloved children, and dear kindred, and the blessed Christian associations of other years, they will stay here. For here they find "Freedom to worship God." The road "to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" is once more widely open to them.

Here too, they will firmly plant the standard of our Protestant Christianity, and sing the sweet songs of Zion, as of yore, in their native land. And though the beautiful Mango, with its wide spreading branches and pleasant shade, may be for a time their only house of prayer, yet they will meet to worship God—and the hymns of Watts and Wesley will be sung in Brazil, as in other lands.

Fraternally yours,
J. E. NEWMAN.

THE PAPAL STATES—POPE'S TEM- PORAL POWER.

As political events in Italy indicate that the Pope's temporal power is fast tottering to its fall, it may be interesting to some of the readers of the Advocate to read some facts Historical, Geographical and otherwise about the Pope's temporal dominions and power.

The origin of the temporal sovereignty, is involved in considerable obscurity; but it seems probable that it grew up imperceptibly out of his spiritual authority, and was confirmed, by, if not based upon, the free choice of his subjects.

About the time of Constantine, some landed possessions seem to have been attached to the see of Rome, which partook of the nature of principalities. From this time forward, to the Pontificate of Gregory, II, (726) by gradual accessions, the temporal power of the Popes had acquired considerable importance. From about this time, the Popes in all their proceedings, assumed the style of temporal Sovereigns. It was not however until Charlemagne had completed the conquest and overthrow of the Lombard Monarchy, (774) that the Popes were fully recognized by surrounding Sovereigns as members of the European body politic.

Charlemagne secured to the Pontiffs, the possessions of the ex-archate of Ravenna, the Island of Corsica, the Provinces of Parma, Mantua, Venice and Istria, and the duchies of Spoleto and Benevento.
The temporal position of the Popes during the middle ages, involved them in wars and quarrels, and a number of them were exiled, imprisoned, or put to death.

Few temporalities in Europe have been more subject to political convulsions and agitations. In 1809 Napoleon entirely subverted the temporal power of the Pope, and annexed the States of the Church to the Kingdom of Italy. The Congress of Vienna, after the downfall of Napoleon, entirely restored the Papal States, and the temporal power of the Pope.

Up to the year 1859, the States of the Church extended entirely across the peninsula of Italy, having a coast line on the Adriatic of 210 miles, and on the Mediterranean of 100 miles, comprising an area of 15,000 square miles, and a population of 8,000,000. Within a few years, however, since the Kingdom of Sardinia has expanded into the Kingdom of Italy, nearly all of the States of the Church have been an-nexed by revelation, and a vote of an overwhelming majority of the people, to the new Kingdom over which Victor Emmanuel reigns. The present dimensions of the States under the temporal dominions of Rome, are but small—confined to the City of Rome and a few provinces lying along the coast of the Mediterranean.

The Pope is an elective absolute Monarch, he is elected by the College of Cardinals, seventy in number, after the model of the Sanhedrim.
These Cardinals are appointed by the Pope, but do not all reside in Italy. All offices, civil, ecclesiastical and educational are filled by the priests. The sacerdotal orders are very numerous in the States of the Church. In 1860, there were nine archbishops, fifty-two bishops, sixteen thousand nine hundred secular clergy, and twenty-one thousand, four hundred and fifteen men belonging to various religious orders, and eight thousand nuns. These religious orders living on endowments, or by begging, and few of them by useful laborers.

Much of the soil is good, and the productions of the climate valuable; but agriculture is pursued with little skill, and less industry. The antiquities, the specimens of fine arts, and historical associations and devotion annually draw to Rome and Italy a vast multitude of tourist, these annually leave millions in the Papal States and contribute much towards the maintenance of any prosperity they may enjoy. Education until the Pontificate of the present Pope, was at a low ebb.
The present Pope has evinced a more liberal and progressive spirit than any of his predecessors for ages.
He has improved the education, the agriculture and the roads of the country, establishing railways and telegraphs. The Pope, as a temporal Sovereign, has had for centuries a standing army and a small navy, as a coast guard and for revenue cutters.

Education morals and public enterprise have long been at a low ebb.
The States of the Church have been regarded as among the worst governed, and poorest in christendom.
The Italians for twenty years past, have been restive and impatient of priestly rule. In 1860 the Emperor Napoleon proposed to the Pope, the voluntary surrender of all his temporal dominions, except the City of Rome and its immediate neighborhood—a proposition Pius IX rejected with considerable warmth. The catholic clergy as a whole are opposed to the Popes giving up voluntarily or otherwise, temporal power, on the ground that it would reduce him from the independence of a sovereign, to the dependence of a subject.

To Protestants there are at least two strange and apparently incongruous things about this temporal power and royal state of the assumed head of the Church, and immediate representative of Christ on earth.

The first is that the professed head of a Kingdom which is not of this World, which cometh not with observation, which is within, of the spirit, should have, or desire to have any temporal dominion at all—the head of a spiritual Kingdom, whose weapons are not carnal, but spiritual; to live in a palace; to be in the receipt of a revenue of millions, and to be maintained on his throne as the ruler of an unwilling people by foreign swords, bayonets and cannons, is a most wonderful paradox.
The next thing that strikes the Protestants with surprise, and as most damaging to the claims of the Pope as the chosen and anointed of Lord, is that the Roman States are among the worst governed, and lowest in the scale of christian civilization, of any state in christendom.
If christianity be the enlightener, elevator, and purifier of humanity, then the country that is under the immediate control of the supreme earthly representative of real christianity ought to be the most enlightened, virtuous, prosperous and happy of all communities; but such is not the fact, by no means the fact, can any real believer in bible christianity, be a believer in the claims and assumptions of the Pope.

The final overthrow of the temporal power of the Pope, must be recognized as an ecclesiastical fact of the gravest significance, as a fulfillment of prophecy, and one of that series of grand events that marks the footsteps of Eternal Providence, as it marches to the consummation of its glorious purposes. It is an event determined and predicted by God, the Judge of all, and whenever it comes, will evince a mighty change in the sentiments of the Christian World, and be the herald, the pledge and specimen of still greater events to be revolved from the future. We shall look with no small measure of interest upon the conflict between the Italians and the Pope.

TENNESSEE CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor:—The Tennessee Conference, convened at Clarksville, Tenn., Oct. 23d. A very full attendance of the members and Lay Representatives. Some men of mind and of mark among the latter —prominent merchants, physicians, lawyers, farmers, and other business men well suited for the work assigned them. Already their voices have been heard upon the Conference floor, in pertinent and effective speech. One of the best speeches we have heard, was from one of our first lawyers, on the spiritual interests of the colored people. A very interesting class of twenty or more, chiefly young men of intelligence and fine promise, were admitted on trial. Not a member of the Conference has died during the year, one young man of fine talent, on trial, has fallen. A large increase in membership is reported from nearly all the charges. Dr. McFerrin, gives a most encouraging report from the Conference he attended in Illinois. Bishop Paine is presiding.
Fifty years ago he first attended the Tenn. Conference. Not one then present, is here, save the bishop alone. Six young men have been admitted this year, from the same county from which the bishop came, fifty years ago. Truly Giles county is the nursery of our Conference.
An average of two annually are admitted from that county. Four from one country church, admitted this year. Why is it that our cities send so few ministers from their churches? Business is progressing very slowly. We may be here for several days. Missionary meetings, at three churches to night. Several visiting brethren from other Conferences in attendance.

Perhaps more next week.

W. VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

The Western Virginia Conference held its session at Barboursville, Oct. 2-8, Bishop Doggett presiding.
We have received from the courteous Secretary, the Rev. W. G.
Miller, a copy of the Minutes, from which we learn that seven were admitted on trial, one was admitted into full connection, and one was readmitted. Seven local preachers were ordained deacons, one local preacher, was ordained elder. One withdrew. Four were placed on the supernumerary list. The return of baptisms is obviously imperfect —only 319 infants and 589 adults.
There are 83 Sunday-Schools reported, 747 teachers, 2,798 scholars.
The Bishop's claim, $185, exclusive of traveling expenses, was paid to Bishop Doggett. The entire claims for the support of the ministry was $15,009—received $10,441 44. The Conference collection was $54—paid to widow and children of S.
Field. $506 84 was raised for missions. There are 69 local preachers, 6,583 white, and 33 colored members—net increase, 2,800. The next session is to be held at Clarksburg, W. Va. the Secretary writes:

"Enclosed you will find Minutes of the Western Virginia Conference, which closed its session on last Tuesday evening at 10 o'clock, p. m., in this place after a very interesting session of six days. Bishop Doggett presided with that courtesy, affability, and high Christian bearing which is peculiar to him, and which has endeared him to ours hears so much, that we are willing to compromise and have him altogether as our Bishop in the future.
The Conference was largely attended, nearly every minister being present. Congregations large, and pulpit exercises full of power—several penitents presented themselves at the altar of prayer, and 2 or 3 found peace. Bishop Doggett's sermon on Sabbath to an immense congregation was one of great power, and made a fine impression on the hearts of the people. You will see by the reports that we are on rising ground—God is with us, and we pray that he may continue with us, that under his blessing the future of the Church may be more prosperous than the past. Our preachers all seem ready and equipped for the work. Fields are opening to us, and the Macedonian cry falls upon our ears. We were somewhat disappointed in not seeing some representative of the missionary and publishing interests with us. Rev.
Dr. Taylor, of Kentucky Conference, paid us a visit, which we highly appreciate: so much so, that the Conference pledged itself to the support of the institution of which he is President. The Exhibit which was made of the success of the Publishing House, Advocate and Visitor, was very gratifying to us, and inspired us with a resolve to do what we can to promote its interests. Our ranks are filling up in the traveling connection, and we will soon be, I trust, under the blessing of God, in the field with a large and efficient body of chieftains, who will "war a good warfare" for the supremacy of the blessed Redeemer's kingdom. Our membership has increased largely.
I will send you more complete reports of committees, etc., in a few days." Wm. GAINES MILLER.

Talladega Circuit—Mont. Conference.

The Lord has revived his work on this charge in a gracious and powerful manner. I began in August, to hold revival meetings, and have continued almost incessantly in this work, having the hearty co-operation of the Local Preachers, and the membership of the Circuit; and the efficient aid of Bro. Curry, the P.
E., and Bro. Kirk, of the Talladega Station, Bros. Ragan and Roberts, (local preachers of White Plains Circuit), and some of the ministers of other denominations among us.
Though we have not gathered as much fruit as we desired and expected; yet the Lord has blest ministers and membership abundantly, and about 70 souls have professed conversion, most of whom have joined our branch of the Christian church. Yours truly,

Shreveport District—Louisiana Conf.
The District meeting for the Shreveport District, Louisiana Conference, for the year 1867, was held at Mansfield, DeSoto Parish, on the 17th and 28th September.

Bishop H. N. McTyeire, being present, presided over the deliberations of the meeting, with great acceptability and profit to all concerned.

The following appointments were represented, Belle Bower, Shreveport, Mansfield, Pleasant Hill, Annacoco and Springville.

Committees were raised as follows:

On the state of the church, Rev. John Pipes, Chairman; On Sunday Schools, John L. Scales, Chairman; On Books and Periodicals, Iverson W. Lane, Chairman; On Missions and Church Extension, Rev. B. F. Alexander, Chairman; On Education, Rev. Charles B. Stewart, Chairman; On Finance, Rev. R. S. Trippett, Chairman; On Churches and Parsonages, Rev. Wm. H. Moss, Chairman; On the Religious Instruction of the Colored People, Rev. J. Sterling Lane, Chairman; On Temperance, Rev. Thomas W. Scott, Chairman.

Reports were made from the circuits and stations in the District, in regard to the various interests of the church, which were full, and in many respects favorable; and which received the earnest consideration of the meeting. The Bishop, in every case made searching inquiries respecting the character and condition of our church property, and urged upon members the special importance of securing proper legal titles to the buildings and ground, occupied and claimed by us.

The Sunday School interest was represented as especially prosperous. Since the close of the war, the Spirit has greatly revived and extended them. Several new schools have been established, and the old ones have largely increased in the number of scholars and efficiency. At many points great attention has been paid to the selecting and accumulating suitable libraries and other facilities for instructions. Altogether, the work is in a healthy and promising condition, and the church has grounds to hope much therefrom.

In due time, the committees made their appropriate reports, which were fully considered; some of them elicited considerable friendly and interesting discussion, and it is believed that these reports and the discussions connected therewith, will tend to give additional life and vigor to the various interests of the church throughout the District.

This, the first meeting for the Shreveport District, was highly enjoyed by the members and the community, in which it was held, and no doubt the system is a success, suitable to the times and eminently calculated to enlarge the influence and power of the church in all its departments. Religious exercises were held during the meeting, and were attended by large and interested audiences. Bishop McTyeire addressed the students of the Mansfield Female College, and also of the Sabbath School, and preached two sermons with more than his usual felicity, and contributed greatly to the interest and value of the occasion.

The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered on Sabbath morning, and was partaken of by an unusually large number of communicants—the scene was peculiarly impressive and solemn.

The following were elected as Lay Delegates to the next Louisiana Conference, Rev. Charles B. Stuart, Mansfield Circuit, Dr. J. W. R. Williams, Springville Circuit, Stephen D. Chapman, Pleasant Hill Circuit, Alternates, Rev. J. Sterling Lane, Pleasant Hill Circuit, John L. Scales, Mansfield Circuit, and John Holmes, Belle Bower, Pleasant Hill, was chosen as the place for holding the next meeting. Rev. Charles B. Stuart, and John L. Scales were appointed to prepare an abstract of the proceedings of the meeting, for publication in the N. O. CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. J. L. Scales, Secy.

Mississippi Conference.

Mr. Emmon:—In an out of the way corner of Holmes' Co. Miss., a protracted meeting was appointed. There was no house near to preach in, but who cared for a house this lovely fall weather. Many had not heard a sermon in this neighborhood for months, and then only by going to a distance. The idea of having preaching at a convenient walking distance, brought out many to labor with zeal and energy in an arbor to protect from the sun. The dwellers in cities, with all their Sunday privileges, can hardly realize how the few sheep even in this wilderness, welcomed the word of life. The hearts of the people generally, seemed prepared at the very beginning of the meeting, men came forward as if they had made up their minds to seek first the kingdom of God. There were no strange preachers to call them out. Rev. H. Williamson, preacher in charge of the circuit, Rev. J. R. Boothe and Rev. Dr. Lyon, local preachers, conducted the meeting. The fields around were literally white, for the harvest—yet the people came together morning and night—(though most of them labor with their own hands) for ten days; until 33 had joined the Church, I wish I could say how many were converted. These, with some here, who were members also, will make a society of about forty. They are taking steps to build a house, we will have a regular appointment, to be known as Providence, in commemoration, to some at least, of the tender care of our Father. We were blessed and comforted at our meeting, by the presence of that venerable man of God, Rev. J. C. F. Bird, the oldest minister I believe, of the Miss. Conference—almost blind for forty years, how his bright cheerful gratitude—his happy religion, shames many of us who are more favored. You know at once he has "peace." No one in the city, can enjoy the Advocate as we do. The children mark the day on which it comes, as the "ADVOCATE DAY." Oh! for money to spread it through our own society.

Elba Circuit—Mont. Conf., Oct. 21, '67.

Mr. Emmon:—Elba Circuit is a field of large area, between Pea and Conecuh Rivers, in the counties of Pike, Crenshaw, Coffee, and Covington, embracing within its limits, two Court Houses, and a goodly number of clever citizens. Among that number we claim some 450 Methodists, 500 children under Methodist influence; but very few of whom have been brought to Jesus by Baptism. There are 14 appointments on the work. (Andalusia, Adams, and Ganits Bridge, have been added this year.) I received at Adams Church, 21 members with the help of Bro. Aries Lumford, of Conecuh Co., within the last month; at Maddox's Church 17 members, in August, by Dr. Ethel Tucker. At other points there have been additions to the Church, and we think that the circuit is improving generally.

Yours, A. MONROE GILLESPIE.

Escambia, Miss—Mont. Conference.

At several points we have had revivals. At Clear Spring, a number professed pardon, and many weeping penitents went away from the meeting unhled. A fine revival influence was left in the community. At Pollard's, we continued a meeting for two weeks, resulting in several happy conversions, and a number of valuable accessions. Our band here now is small, but they are faithful.

"Walking in all his ways, they find Their heaven on earth begun."

It is a live church. What a privilege to attend their prayer meetings, and class-meetings! And now, that our new church is finished, we expect the Lord to soon enlarge our borders. Tell all the preachers that Pollard is no longer a dry place to stay at.

Yours,

MISSIONARY.

The publican and the disciple, the heathen and the christian, may agree in the material acts of charity; but that which formally makes this a christian grace is the spring from which it flows, and the recompense at which it aims.

GEORGE MULLER.

Who has failed to read "Muller's Life of Trust?" Read the following letter to the Boston Journal, written by "Carleton," from Bristol, England, and, then read the book we mention above:

Thirty-seven years ago a young man who was born in Prussia, and who had been a soldier in the Prussian army, came to England. He had been wild and reckless, but had become converted, and with his conversion there came a strong desire to serve the Lord Jesus. He preached awhile at Teignmouth in company with a Mr. Clark. After awhile the two came to Bristol and undertook to preach without any fixed salary. While here Mr. Muller was deeply affected at the sight of fatherless and motherless children, and resolved with the help of God to do something for them. He had no means, but he knew that the silver and the gold were the Lord's and he believed that the Lord would bring some of it into use for the benefit of the orphans if men would ask for it. He resolved that prayer alone should be his instrumentality—that he would not ask help or aid from any man and that he never would run in debt. Here is his principle of action in his own words:

"I have always said this to myself; just because it is the work of the Lord, if indeed, I am the person who has to do this work, and if his own time has come, I may expect to be supplied with means; but it, for the time being, I have not the means, it is plain that I am either not the person to do the work, or the Lord's time has not yet come."

Acting upon this principle he began to pray for means; and means came—very small at first. He gave up his own house to orphans and very soon had it filled. He had great difficulties. People thought him crazy. Sometimes he had very little food on hand for the children. He was so straitened that that he was obliged to sell furniture, but he never ran in debt! He kept praying and means began to flow in more largely. People from a distance, all unknown to him, sent money. Others called to see the orphans and left something to help him on when they went away.

He left his own house and took a larger one. Finally he moved out from the city to Ashley Downs and established the present Orphan Asylum. He began this work in 1834. And now let us ride out to see this establishment, which, in the words of the Bristol Times, of this morning, is a "Modern Marvel."

It is but a half hour's ride, and as we leave the thickly settled streets of the city, ascend a hill, along a winding way, from which we look down upon a lovely English landscape, orchards, hedgerows, lawns, parks, fields of grain ready for the reaper, country seats and villas, avenues of elms and oaks, flocks of sheep quietly browsing on the down. Just such a prospect as can be found nowhere else, other than in England. It is in such a spot of quiet rural beauty, near to the city, and yet removed from its noise, that Mr. Muller has established this "Home for Little Wanderers." Our driver called it the "Orphan Village," and it is a village by itself—five large houses, with yards in front set off with plots of flowers and garden vegetables, all kept in perfect order and exquisite neatness. There are two large buildings of stone under construction, and the click of the trowels keeps time to the music of the children, which comes floating on the air from the open windows of the school room.

This is the children's home. Here they eat, sleep, study, play—cared for by the great-hearted man who has been the agent of God in building up this establishment. He has able assistants and co-laborers. Everything goes like clock-work. The total number of orphans in the institution since 1836 is 2,263. He has at the present time 1150, and already has applications enough to fill the buildings now being erected. The girls generally remain until they are eighteen; the boys till fourteen. They are instructed in reading, writing, arithmetic, English grammar, geography, English history, a title of general history, needlework and house work; and places are secured for them in Christian families when they leave the institution. This however, is but a small part of the work carried on by Mr. Muller. He has established Sunday and day schools not only in Bristol, but in other large towns, and through his agency 16,000 scholars have been instructed.

The way in which all this has been accomplished is truly a marvel that has no parallel in history. The expenditure last year was $174,245, and the total expenditure since the year 1834 is $1,845,000. Through his agency 42,000 copies of the Bible, 34,000 Testaments, 10,000 of the Psalms and 29,000,000 tracts and books have been circulated.

Besides this 120 missionaries have been sustained at a cost of $353,000. For the erection and furnishing of the buildings, $500,000 has been expended, and yet Mr. Muller never has made an appeal to the public; never has he asked an individual to aid him, never has employed any agency save that of prayer to God!

See how the donations have come. I quote from his report just issued: From Scotland—$100 from a lady, a thank-offering to the Lord for the preservation of her cattle from the plague. From the west of England—4 bracelets, 3 gold brooches, some playthings and a necklace, from a Christian lady. From Oxfordshire—$39.50, instead of insuring 316 acres against hail. From the East Indies—$100. From a Christian baker—$25, made up, by putting aside one penny per sack of flour baked and the money he used to spend at the club. From the earliest orphan under his care—$1.25. From Buenos Ayres, S. A.—$30. From a farmer's wife—$30, one penny out of every pound of butter sold during the year. From a reclaimed criminal—$5.

From a Christian grocer, 3s. 1d., being one penny in the pound of his takings for one week. Through the fifty-two weeks of the year this man has sent a similar offering.

Were I to go on I should fill the Journal with these accounts. One peasant sends a hive of honey. From Devonshire he receives tea-spoons; from Herefordshire a farmer sends him the amount which his calves brought. Somebody in Bengal, East Indies, sends $150. From Pennsylvania he receives $84. Even in Demerara some one is moved to send a gift. Men of means are impelled to forward large amounts, $10,000, $15,000, $41,000; and in contrast to these a milliner, who had hard work to keep body and soul together, by putting aside one penny for every dress accumulated 72 penny stamps, which she sent in the name of Christ to those who were poorer than herself!

Well may this be called a wonder. It is something for the Christian world to study. Most of the missionary societies of the day have salaried agents. They are managed by boards of directors, and they carry on their operations by constant appeals to the public. Many churches erect their meeting-houses by running in debt; but in contrast to all this, a poor man, destitute of means, by prayer alone, by rigid adherence to his rule of doing nothing till he has the means, and of looking to God for the means, carries on a work involving an expenditure of $174,245 per annum. The Christian world evidently has yet something to learn in the matter of faith and the dispensation of charity.

From Good Words.

THE UNJUST STEWARD.

It will be seen how naturally the lessons of our Lord's parable have been welling forth through one continuous chain of fifteen verses. I have but indicated a few of them. Lessons against all dishonesty in our dealings with our fellow-men; lessons against all hypocrisy in covering our own malpractices; lessons against all mean thoughts of God, as if He could be deceived with lip-service, bought off with offerings; lessons against all palterings with the consciences of men, in teaching them to underrate their moral obligations; lessons against all reliance on human approval, on the worth of our own good works—all these, and far more besides, may be found in this wonderful parable, from the moment that it is rescued from that low interpretation of it which would see the Almighty, All-seeing God under the type of a debonair dupe, and assimilate almsgiving to successful dishonesty.

And have these lessons ever been more than among ourselves? Who does not know the Unjust Steward? Is he not to be found in every church and chapel? ay, and in many a pulpit? His Lord's wealth—be it money, land, powers of mind, fair fame—was trusted to him for his Lord's service. He has spent it for his own; but of a portion of it he is willing ostentatiously to give account. You see him constant at religious services; his name is prominent in lists of subscribers to charities. What right have you to ask whether as a tradesman he has not made his way by means of the false measure and the deceitful weight, by adulterations and lies; as an employer, by grinding down men, women and children, to starvation wages; as a lawyer, by the thousand little sharp tricks which justice seldom detects, whilst they cling like vermin to her skirts; as a journalist, by the venal service of the pen; as a politician, by pandering to the passions of peer or people; as a minister of religion, by bold denunciations of sin in general, and careful particular sparing of it in those whom it is not expedient to denounce? "Is there knowledge in the Most High?" Will He not be satisfied with the decent profession, the punctual attendance at worship, the profuse almsgiving? Will He be more discerning than men? The Unjust Steward never walks abroad but surrounded by a group of friends. They learn at his school, they profit by his example. Is it not in every one of them silencing the voice of conscience, as that tells them of those "weightier matters of law" which they and he omit—whispering, pleasantly to this man, "Take thy bill, and write down fifty," and to that man, "Take thy bill, and write down fourscore?" Who would not feel honored by his friendship—who would not offer him a home?

To all which replies that dread voice of old: "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that they may receive you into everlasting habitations!" He that is faithful in the least is faithful in much, and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. God knoweth your hearts; for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God.

I need not go further into this chapter, although the whole of it seems to me to be connected together. Vers. 16-18 are probably fragmentary, and the latter at least indicates a denunciation of the hypocritical licentiousness of the Pharisees (compare Matt. vi. 21-32) exactly parallel to the denunciation of their hypocritical covetousness under the type of the unjust steward, and which might even easily be deducted from the parable. For the encouragement of divorce—the lowering of the standard of moral purity among men—what is it again but, "Take thy bill, and write down fifty?" You thought you owed perfect chastity in married life to God? Nay, it is enough if you keep yourself to one wife for a time, and then change her for another. Is the counsel that of any other but an unjust steward? Must he not himself have "wasted his lord's goods"—have thrown away his own moral purity, so to teach another? Will he not meet with the same worldly success as that other steward? Must he not look for the same searching out of his hypocrisy by that Master whom he cannot deceive—by that God who knoweth the hearts?

Is not the parable of Dives and Lazarus itself a branch of the same teaching? It is surely misapprehending its meaning to suppose that Dives never did anything for Lazarus. For aught we know, he may have showered coppers over him every time he left his home. The mere fact that the beggar was laid by his gate seems to show that he got something by lying there. Dives never seems to have spurned him away, still less to have set his dogs on him. What he does is simply to leave him where he is. He makes no attempt to lift Lazarus out of his beggarhood; no attempt to restore him to sound health. His fulness is not troubled by the sight of his neighbor's misery. Perhaps he rather likes to have the beggar at his gate—a living testimony to his wealth—a ready object for ostentatious almsgiving. But as to the crumbs from his table—the delicate fragments which the poor sick man may long for, which a true human sympathy would be ingenious in selecting for him—these he must desire in vain. They are no doubt for the dogs, who, kinder than their master, come and lick the beggar's sores. . . . And were not the Pharisees, in the spiritual order of God's world, precisely that rich man? With the wealth of God's promises were they not "clothed in purple and fine linen," faring "sumptuously every day?" The poor Gentile lay at the gate like a beggar, sore under the burden of his sins, of his false worship. They had no human sympathy with him. They might be proud of him, as of a "prosyte of the gate;" they might fling out to him, as coppers to a beggar, their hard and heavy ordinances, but the "crumbs from the table," that which his sick, yearning soul might feed on, these were not for him. In this manner the parable, whilst opening quite a new group of lessons, may offer one closely akin to the previous ones of the chapter. Dives is still an unjust steward, only this time not a smooth hypocrite, but an open denier of his obligations. He fares sumptuously every day, as if he had no lord to account to. He is called to no account during his life, and therefore never needs to make friends at another's expense. But the end is the same. The "everlasting habitations" are not for him! Hell and torments are his portion; Abraham's bosom is that of the poor beggar.

The interpretation I have offered to ver. 7 of the chapter, it has been objected that irony is a form of speech which is inconsistent with our Lord's character. This I cannot admit. His words to the lawyer (chap. x. 23) asking what he should do to inherit eternal life—"This do, and thou shalt live," seem plainly ironical, as if He had said, "Do this if thou canst," the implication being, "Thou canst not do it."

A still more striking instance, however, is given by St. John (xii. 1) when the Jews took up stones to stone Him: "Many good have I showed you from my Father, for which of these works do ye stone me?" it being obvious that they would ever consciously do other for a good work. But the ironical interpretation verse were not supported by instances (to which others are easily added from the Old Testament—those of Elijah and Moses occur to any one), I have learned that He who was Perfect God as well as Perfect God, lawfully use any form of speech which might be used by a man for giving force to his words. If irony could be sin in itself, must prescribe it for every man.

Another objection which is, that the interpretation of the Pharisees to be almsgiving, whereas they are expressly to be "covetous." I should thought that the "covetousness" almsgiving with covetousness, a fact too painfully familiar to the observer of the manner of fellow men—nay, to every looks into his own heart—a moment's hesitation on the subject at any rate it is beyond the doubt that the duty of almsgiving is sedulously inculcated by the Pharisees; nay, that from the when the book of Ecclesiastes is written to the present it is an essential feature of the system of the Jewish law, when we recollect that the to the Sermon on the Mount, this, that it shows forth a "ness which" "shall exceed the covetousness of the scribes," it appears to be incredible that the Pharisees hypocrite almsgiver, trumpet before him in gorges and in the streets, meant to apply to Pharisees as well as to, as above, all others.

A real difficulty indeed in ver. 11, but remaining interpretation. What is the "riches" the Pharisees? Is this world's wealth? Or, conversely, what is the substantive to which the "true" applies? Is there mammon? The italics of "riches" show that our have shrunk from such a If we adhere to the text, it is, perhaps, to be got over by holding that wealth is not "unrighteous," that it only becomes misused; and that "the unrighteous mammon" in the candid avowal of shortcomings. This is a link with the parable of the Prodigal Son, who "faithful in the unrighteous mammon" from the moment repented, and so became trusted with the "true" his father's forgiveness. But such a view of ver. 12 harmonises with the parable of ver. 12, and on the strongly suspect that of the verse is in fact, some other adjective more contrasted with "true" originally stood in the place one which has been transcribed. That some version of the whole was formerly extant seems from a singular reference to a saying of our Lord: "those who were unrighteous towards Him: 'If ye have faithful in a little, who you that which is great suggests vers. 10-12 of the chapter without reproduction of the three, and imply other circumstances."

I offer the above interpretation as a confessedly puzzling problem, as having satisfied myself as having satisfied myself I know, however, that clerical friend of great been led to the same conclusion respect to the ironical ver. 9.

A CHANGE FORESHADOWED
LUTHERAN CHURCH.—Great seems to exist among the in this country. Ritualism to be the primary cause, radical differences of opinion that subject, which have much to vex the peace of glican Church, may soon permanent division of the Church. The Old School, who are Symbolists, fall New School, who are Evangelists, in numbers, capacity and The Old School, apparently taken the initiative. "It is they have already gone to propose to be a church for themselves—in other words, lock their temples against isters except such as may utterance to their peculiar and creed.

doing their duty to their children might supply; they feel that it is not their business, and do not charge themselves personally with the duty of looking after them on the Sunday. No doubt this is putting the case in an extreme form; at the same time, many worthy persons have long had a similar difficulty to that of Mr. Sweet's, in connection with Sunday-schools, through fear of their weakening the parents' sense of responsibility. In Scotland, the old habit of parental instruction of the families on Sabbath evenings continues to a considerable degree to maintain its ground, though not so thoroughly as it did at one time. The practice of taking children from the Sabbath-school to church en masse is very seldom adopted in that part of the island. Parents of the working classes are much more in the habit of taking their children with them to church. Ministers and teachers, however, and church-wards too, are constantly finding it requisite to appeal to parents, and to urge the duty of direct personal interest in the religious instruction of their children. I must be confessed that but little progress has yet been made in the solution of the great problem, how to secure that, as in the ancient Jewish Church, parents shall teach God's laws diligently to their children, and at the same time the children shall have the benefit of the teaching gifts of those members of our congregations who, both by temperament and by race, are best fitted to interest, and instruct, and impress the young.

The other circumstance which has attracted attention to Sunday-schools is a speech of the Bishop of Oxford, presiding lately at a conference on the subject in the Isle of Wight. The bishop Wilberforce strongly objected to the prevailing practice, declaring that the "be-good" system of teaching had proved a failure, and to drive wearied children to when they turned sleepy, or to make horrid faces at them when they began to buzz was atrocious:

to the children attending the day schools ought to be treated in a different manner from those who did not so attend, and to get Sunday for rest; that every means would be used to make Sunday scholars happy, and that the Sunday-school need only have some coloring of Christianity and religious instruction. To this it has been replied that if the Sunday-schools under the Bishop's control are such as his picture would seem to imply, it is high time that some remedy were applied to cure them, not in so far as his remarks represent that the dry, hard, coercive system is the prevalent one in Sunday-schools, the facts show them to be quite unfounded. No doubt, amid the vast multitude of Sunday-schools in the country, there are many conducted on most erroneous views of human nature in general, and children's nature in particular; but it is out of the question to deny that these institutions, as a whole, have shared the benefit of that improved spirit that of late years have so vastly brightened the tone of instruction in all schools, and made learning no such more of a pleasure as it used to be. And as to the allegation that children who are receiving instruction on week days are neglecting the Sunday for rest, and ought not therefore to be bored with lessons, it seems to proceed from overlooking two things; that children's week-day holidays are almost abundant, and that an hour of bright, pleasant instruction on the Sabbath-day is anything but a weariness. No teacher of sense and grace, in dealing with very young children, attempts much more than to give a right direction to their thoughts, and make a wholesome impression on their hearts; and if no other end were served by this than to keep them employed, and out of mischief, it would be a great boon, to the children, and keep off from them the weariness which idleness and listlessness involve.

gational churches of Vermont have enjoyed unusual religious prosperi-

3. Their membership has been increased by 1,084 received by profession, while their net gain has been 529. In connection with the very general revival interest there are several encouraging and suggestive facts: 1. The most productive fields have been those in which the smallest churches are found. 2. Nearly every instance of quickening was intimately connected with the observance of the Week of Prayer. 3. The revivals have been largely the result of an unusual amount of lay activity. In view of the consideration that small churches are those which are most neglected and are most likely to decline, the first of these facts is decidedly encouraging. The second suggests the importance of observing the Week of Prayer as a means of promoting revivals; and the third serves to teach the value of lay effort.

TO OUR AGENTS.

In making changes please state the place from which, as well as the place to which the change is made. We are very desirous that our subscription list should be doubled between this and the meeting of our own patronizing Conferences. Planters will have money on hand early this year if at all, so that now is the most favorable time to secure subscribers. As they have no longer any temptation to invest their incomes in either land or negroes, they can easily be persuaded to take a paper. Try it. Every good man should have in his house a paper bringing the weekly statement of the work of God among the Churches. He should read the precious record of the death of holy men and women, whose final triumph strengthens our hopes, and subdues our passions. Every one given to thinking and forecasting, will need much light to keep up with the astounding events which are shaping hourly the fortunes of the Southern people. The ADVOCATE will furnish some contribution towards supplying these wants.

Thanks to the Howard Association.

MR. EDITOR:—The first case of yellow fever in Washington, St Landry Parish, this season, occurred about the 20th of August. Since that time we report about five hundred cases of fever, and sixty eight deaths, in the town and its vicinity; and the end is not yet. When the Doctor announced the first case of Black Vomit, about two-thirds of the citizens sought refuge in the country, while those of limited means mainly, were compelled to remain, and meet the destroyer as bravely as they could. With purses depleted, Town treasury empty—vocations suspended—and country supplies contravened by popular fear—while poverty and the plague; threatened our extermination, our case seemed almost desperate, but a gracious providence greatly mitigated our sufferings. The contribution of a thousand dollars, by the "Howard Association" of your city, through the agency of Messrs. Doerns and Anson, and the unremitting attention of Dr. T. Cooke, merit our gratitude and a public acknowledgment.

NOTHING TO LIVE FOR.

This expression has often fallen from the lips of the pious. And yet we question the consideration and the truth of it in most cases. We can scarcely imagine a situation in which it is justifiable. With no higher views of life than those which are held outside of the Christian faith and revelation, there are many circumstances that may lead to this utterance of despair. A man whose interest in life terminates in himself, or in his own immediate family; or to whom the end of living, is in physical enjoyment, or the pleasures and successes of business, politics or literature, may arrive at a point where these objects are utterly and hopelessly gone.

If mere enjoyment, and happiness, in its common acceptance, be the absorbing pursuit, these may be exhausted long before the appointed years are numbered. It happens that the individual is bereft, in the summer or winter time of his age, of those for whom he was living. Flower, and leaf, and branch are lopped off. Or he has reached an age when the physical senses have lost their delicacy as avenues of grateful sensations. Cotemporary men and women have passed, and he is left alone in a young world with which he finds little that is congenial. The fortune he has sought has eluded his grasp, or has melted away from his possession. He finds himself without a country, after long years and prayers for its welfare. He feels himself to be disinherited and ejected from the world in which were all his hopes and joys.

A Christian is not insensible to these influences, and under stress of affliction and disappointment, may feel that he has nothing to live for. The words are unadvised, and the sentiment false. We are supposing that things have come to their worst pass: that disappointment is at every turn; that we are so bereft and stripped, that the worldly eye sees not a vestige of inducement for continued existence here. In fact, so desperate a state is seldom reached, where even the unbelieving and carnal heart, will not find something amongst the ashes and cinders of its broken and devastated temples. But we suppose and admit the reality of the worst that can be stated or felt. Here the afflicted soul comes to the conviction of an aimless life. And so it would be if there were no world to come, no spirit within us to be purified by fire, and no millions of human and redeemed creatures to be helped by us.

Allowance should be made for the hour of paralyzing, and alienating grief, and for the shock and fury of the overwhelming storm. But does not this feeling of uselessness grow out of narrow and selfish conceptions of what we live for? The snow-shoe, by placing the weight upon a broader surface, sustains the wearer. We sink, because the base is narrowed to a point. The heart has lavished its affections exclusively upon a single group or speck, instead of taking, in its affluence sweep, the races and generations of men. The elements of happiness have been gathered around self. Our earnest prayers and our fervent love, and our tender sympathies, have scarcely extended beyond the circle of family ties and personal friendships. It is a shell of narrowness and selfishness in which we have been living, even religiously living. The feeling that we have nothing to live for, reveals this terrible defect. If our world and our religious affections have been pressed into this limited compass, it may often be deeply and sadly felt that life is left without an object. You are living for your children, or for an only child. They are taken, or the idol in which your being is engrossed is removed. You have been absorbed in the attempt to realize some ideal of earthly happiness, and it is now shivered into pieces. What is there left? If on the other hand your life, its purposes, plans and ends, had been projected upon the broader Catholicity of Christ's life, and your mind had been "the mud that was in Christ," how different, and how much more cheerful, the conclusion that would have been reached?

Self love, temporal enterprises, kindred ties, and the temperate pleasures of life are allowable ends, if held in connection with, and subordinate to the claims of Christ. It is the limited and imperfect notion of duties confined to our nearest relations and inferior interests, that makes it possible for any one to say that he has nothing to live for. Surely if we are crucified with Christ, our sympathies and love are expanded with his. The natural affection which commended Mary to the care of the beloved disciple, did not exclude tender solicitude for the world. Neither did devotion to Jerusalem swallow up that wider concern for all the ages and the races. The Cross is the exponent of an unselfish benevolence whose universality stretches so far beyond humanity even, as to bind and reconcile the things in heaven. There is nothing sectional in Christ. His name and spirit rebuke it. To put on Christ is at the same time to put off self, and to be emancipated from sectionalism, and from the bondage of "inordinate affection." In Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, male nor female, bond nor free.

The scope of redemption embraces all relations and conditions, and gives its own breadth to those who are imbued with its spirit. The heavenly citizenship breaks over all domestic and geographical boundaries, and carries us wherever men and angels live, and beyond them, to the universal Mediator, and the one God and Father of all. It is only when our existence and its objects have been shut in to the merest atom and molecule of the great universe, that this conviction, of having nothing to live for, is possible. It is really the hell which selfishness and idolatry have kindled about the soul. It is a death, and despair for want of enlargement, and the liberty of the Lord's Spirit. When God, in his providence takes away the objects around which our affections have been gathered, he evidently designs to liberate, and to lead out into other and wider fields of usefulness. The odors of the broken vase are not lost, but set free. There is something to live for so long as the world stands, and we remain in it. This we shall realize when the narrowness of self and its near modifications are crushed out of us, and we attain to the mind of Christ.

We know of devoted believers who for years, have kept their beds, unable to feed themselves. Are such examples of patient suffering without their value to the Church and the world? There are those whom age and infirmity have retired from active exertion of any kind, but they are not shelved, so long as prayer remains to them, and they can bear witness to the faithfulness of the promises, and the comfort of the Holy Ghost. We have seen believing men and women, bereft and sorely stricken, thrust out into greater usefulness, and exhibiting the power of the gospel to sustain and comfort, as they never did before. When we have reached the point where it seems that we have nothing to live for, we have really come to a vantage ground of usefulness. The loss to ourselves is a gain to Christ, and we are now furnished for earnest work.

How can any Christian be without something to do in a world like this, full of suffering, and sin? The thing that is next to us invites effort. Reduce the misery in your own neighborhood, and increase the comfort and happiness. Take hold of the most homely of opportunities, and be content and thankful for any open door, so it enables you to do a kind and helpful office to the body or soul of one for whom Christ has died. Especially let us sometimes go beyond the limits of kindred, and the tether of self. True benevolence may be hatched and nurtured by the affections of home, but it must not always abide in the nest. Our religion is unfledged as yet, unless our love dares a wider flight. If God has shaken and thrust you out, accept the lesson and apply it. If he has not, do not wait for the storm, or the bolt that shall shatter the bough. Flight strengthens the wings and gilds the plumes.

THE PAN ANGLICAN.

The council of Lambeth has finished its business sessions, which continued through Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday until after 4 o'clock in the afternoon. As they sat with none but themselves present (except a stenographic reporter,) and as their proceedings were to be regarded as confidential until the session closed, and as a motion was carried at the close that the stenographic report should be written out and laid up in the archives at Lambeth Palace, but not printed (1)—it is simply impossible to give anything like an adequate or full account of the very interesting and important discussions that have occupied the attention of the council. The things done are to be published at once in full, together with a synodical epistle or pastoral letter signed by all the bishops present.

The things done by this well advertised Council, were few: a statement of the standard of true catholicity, was discussed; and the whole affair of Natal. But did they turn out, throw overboard, reduce, or expel their famous Bishop Colenso? Not a bit of it. The delicate question of the mutual relations of Church and State "held them back." They remembered "the things which perish"—their bread and butter—and, anxious to protect the present status and strength of the English Government, they left the great question of the occasion untouched; they swallowed the insult and disgrace which the openly avowed infidel principles of Colenso has put upon the Church of England. What must be thought of the spiritual vitality of a body of Bishops called from various parts of Christendom, after a most solemn and imposing style, assembled in the palace of Lambeth, as the embodied host militant of the Lord, who yet have not courage, or singleness of purpose, or love of the truth enough to officially as a body, positively, and authoritatively expel the said Episcopal Infidel from the pale of their communion? So it was.

The Church of England is wholly without discipline, "the stonewall thereof is thrown down." It has not the moral power necessary to protect itself. Its low standard of godliness and its wavering support of the faith are only surpassed by its high sounding pretensions. The things left undone by this "S. P. G." should be told as well as those done. The American Bishops made a stand for the faith, "But the bishop of St. David's rose and stated that the archbishop had pledged himself to him that the Colenso question should not be acted on in the conference; and he appealed to "the honor" of the archbishop to say whether this were not so.

"The archbishop said that it was so, and that to act directly on the question of Dr. Colenso would be the breach of an honorable understanding. It was intended to convey this understanding in those words of the invitation which said that the meeting would of course not be competent to make declarations of doctrine."

After this, "a paper" was introduced "on the present status of Dr. Colenso," and informally signed, ("the words 'in conference' being omitted") by the Colonial and American Bishops, and thus ended this signal and futile attempt to exclude avowed heresy. One who reads the address of this grand Council to the "faithful," exhorting them to "maintain the faith once delivered to the saints," will justly appreciate the force of the document. So far as the Council and its action at present appear to the public, it was a great solemn nothing, well conducted, deliberately pronounced, a San Pan Gammon, ("S. P. G.") for universal subsequent ventilation, and admiration, and quotation.

If thou be merciful, God hath bound Himself to be merciful to thee again. Lo, is not this an exceeding great thing, that God, which of no right ought to be bound to his creatures hath put it whole in thy hands to bind Him, against the day of thy tribulation, to show thee mercy.

PERSONAL.

A private letter from Bishop PAINE, dated, Aberdeen, Miss., Oct. 5th, 1867, gives us cheering news of the work of God in our Church. He says: "I have just returned home to rest a few days, and get ready for my tour of Conferences, after having done the hardest years work I have passed through in thirty-seven years. My health seemed to fail several times, but by God's blessing, I have been enabled to meet all my engagements, except on the Starkville District, I must regret that sickness prevented."

"The result of my observation is that almost everywhere I have been, the Church is being revived, and preachers and members are working nobly. In many sections, revivals are going on—good old fashioned revivals. God has not forsaken us, blessed be His holy name! and our people are trying to live peaceably and piously. I witnessed many conversions."

"I need scarcely assure my brethren of your Conference, that I deeply sympathize with you, in your afflictions. I know your poverty and trials, and pray that your faith and patience fail not in this hour of distress. I hope the fever will not spread, and that the preachers may be spared for future usefulness."

"As yet I rejoice, that I have not heard of the death of any of them by the scourge. But we shall feel the loss of our noble brother Alexander. May God bless and preserve you all with your families, and give great success to your labors."

City News.

BOARD OF HEALTH.—At a meeting on 28th inst., the motion of Dr. Stone, declaring the city free from yellow fever epidemic—failed to pass—but was referred to the committee on health.—The Governor's proclamation of Quarantine was suspended.

The following remarks were submitted by Dr. Stone in support of his resolution declaring that yellow fever is no longer epidemic:

Dr. Stone offered a resolution to the effect that the yellow fever be declared to exist no longer in this city as an epidemic. Dr. Smith and Mr. Pennington objecting to the resolution, Dr. Stone addressed the Board and stated his reasons for making the motion. He said that his observations, since his return to the city, had proved conclusively to him that the disease had run its course. He met people on the streets every day who had not had the fever, and certainly they, having been here during the entire summer, exposed to the subtle poison which has pervaded the atmosphere, are more liable to contract the fever than those who have been travelling North. It was a mistaken idea to suppose that because we may have been absent from the city during portions of epidemic season, that therefore we could be more apt to contract the fever on returning; on the contrary, those persons who are in the most vigorous health are more able to combat the atmospheric influence, and to resist the disease if contracted.

He believed that there was little poison in the air here now, and that what there was, is so widely diffused as to render it extremely improbable that parties returning to the city would be affected by it. There would undoubtedly be, for some time, sporadic cases, but they would amount to nothing. He has known scattering cases of yellow fever here during Christmas, but it would have been folly to have advised persons to remain away from the city on that account. His experience taught him that the disease never, continued in an epidemic form for more than twelve weeks, and that after the lapse of that period it would cease, whether there were frost or not. Frost did not necessarily destroy the disease; he preferred seeing bright, cold weather, such as we are now having to seeing a frost, for the latter is always an indication of bad weather. In answer to a remark of the President as to use of disinfectants, etc., Dr. Stone replied that, for a disease so intangible as yellow fever, it was almost impossible to find an antidote. It is a mysterious poison that sweeps over the land which we cannot take hold of and analyze. We could only be guided in the future by what experience has taught us in the past, and he had failed to discover that the disease was at all contagious. He contended that whatever is contagious is uniformly so, and that there were numerous instances where yellow fever had failed to spread itself, though parties were constantly brought in contact with the sick. Taking all these things into consideration, he thought it perfectly safe to declare the fever non-epidemic. Those persons who are residing within a radius of 200 miles of the city are much safer here, and before parties at a distance can arrive, there will be no danger for them.

The resolution of the Council, rescinding all previous legislation on subject of public schools, and which left them without adequate appropriations and organization, was vetoed by Mayor Heath.

A resolution offered in Council asking Military Authorities to remove the existing Board of School Directors, was defeated in the Upper Board, by vote of four, against two colored members. All the District Courts open Monday, November 4th.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The epidemic has steadily abated for some days past, but we are as yet unable to chronicle the arrival of any number of country merchants to lay in their winter supplies, and the wholesale business continues extremely dull. There has been, however, an active demand for our leading staple, the sales of which have been on a more liberal scale than at any time this season. There are still many foreign orders pending here which have not been executed, and planters may send forward their crops under the assurance that they will meet a ready sale at fair prices compared with the New York market. We notice the receipt of ten hogheads of new sugar, the first of this year's crop, they being good yellow centrifugal and sold to a dealer at 17c per lb. The first receipts last year were at the same date, October 27. There were also some additional receipts yesterday, as will be seen from the report below. We may now expect to see more animation in the market, but as yet the business is confined to retail transactions. There is a fair enquiry for Tobacco, but no transactions in it have transpired of any moment. The movement in Western Produce has been of about the usual extent, with more animation in flour, which is commanding full prices.

The River has fallen 1 inch since our last report, and is now 13 feet 10 inches below high water mark.

COTTON.—On 22nd inst. the market closed at 14 to 15c Ordinary, 16 to 16 1/2c for Good Ordinary, 17 1/2 to 18c Low Middling, 18 1/2 to 19c Middling, since which, under the favorable tenor of the Liverpool accounts noticed above, the movement has been more active and prices have advanced 1/2 to 1c lb. On Saturday the previous demand was resumed with increased animation, and although factors were still more stringent in their pretensions and the weather was dark and rainy, yet, under the favorable accounts received from New York and Liverpool, fully 1800 bales changed hand, partly at previous rates, and partly at still higher figures, Good Ordinary being quoted at 16 1/2c, Low Middling at 18c, and Middling at 19c. On Monday the movement was less general, but buyers came forward with more spirit, and notwithstanding the depressing course of the Exchange market, which made negotiations of either Sterling or Francs extremely difficult, even at low rates, the sales reached 2500 bales, at prices indicating a further improvement. Good Ordinary being quoted at the close at 16 1/2c, Low Middling at 18c, and Middling at 19c to 19 1/2c. Yesterday operations were restricted by purchasers awaiting a more ample supply—hourly expected to be placed on sales, as well as by the inconsiderable amount of the offering and more stringent pretensions on the part of factors, and the business was confined to 1500 bales, taken at somewhat irregular prices, which, on the whole, however, indicated a further slight improvement.

The receipts proper for the past three days embrace 3293 bales, against 3113 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 280 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 30,595 bales, against 76,119 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 23,759 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 26,565 bales to Great Britain, of 9555 to France, and 1358 to other foreign ports.

Receipts since 25th inst. 3992 bales: cleared since 25th inst. for New York 325; stock in warehouse on ship board not cleared on 29th inst. 36,850 bales. New Orleans classification assimilating to that of Liverpool, is viz:

Good Ordinary..... 17 to 17 1/2
Middling..... 19 to 19 1/2

MOLASSES.—Ten half barrels new Molasses, the first this season, were received on Monday, the 28th inst. classed Prime and sold to a dealer at $1.05 per gallon. Onba Molasses has been selling to distillers at 55 to 60c per gallon, as in quality and quantity. The imports during the past three days comprise 335 hds and 48 cts from Cuba. Arrived since the 25th inst. 5 bbls.

CORN.—Continues very scarce. It is in demand, and prices have advanced largely. Owing to scarcity the sales on Saturday were confined to small lots at $1.60, and on Monday at $1.60 to 1.75 per bushel.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.

The next session of this institution commences on the 19th September, 1867. As evidence of her success as an educator of young men, she presents a list of graduates all over the South. No location surpasses this in point of health. The town of Boynton and surrounding country has but one physician, and he is but half employed. In addition to the schools of Moral Philosophy, Ancient Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Modern Languages, we have also a school of Commercial Science, in which are taught the branches of a business education. Young men attend any schools they wish, and get a showing for whatever they accomplish. It is our intention hereafter, to fill up our vacations with a special session, so that young men can review any studies they wish, but more particularly to teach English grammar, Commercial Arithmetic, Book-keeping, Penmanship, and Commercial Law. Thus, our students can take the Literary and Scientific course during the session, and get a practical instruction in business during the vacations. The Special Session in vacation covers the heated term in the South when business is over, and young men already engaged in business can come here to perfect their knowledge of Commercial Science, and return to the South in time to resume business. Expenses for ten months, including meals, use of furniture, (averaged,) fuel, lights, washing, matriculation and contingent fee, tuition in three schools, so as to occupy the student's whole time—$300, one-half payable at the commencement of each term. A daily line of hacks, Sundays excepted, runs from Roanoke station (Richmond & Danville Railroad) to Boynton. Send for circulars. Randolph, Macon College, Boynton, Mecklenburg Co., Va., July 20, '67. burdened, in consequence of the commercial failure of the two firms of Ballantyne & Co. and Constable & Co., the result of his exertion between January, 1826, and January, 1828, was in all very near £40,000. This amount, however, includes the sum of £18,000 which Sir Walter received for the first and second editions of his "Life of Napoleon." And that the toils of the two sown and reaping years were equally fortunate, may be inferred from the circumstance that at a meeting of

Dr. Tyng, senior, has recently caused a new sensation. At the opening of his new church, the venerable Dr. Gardiner-Spring of the Presbyterian Church, one of the intimate friends of Dr. Tyng, was among the invited clerical guests who took part in the services. His plain black suit was in marked contrast with the clerical robes of his Episcopal brethren, and made him the special object of observation.

"The perfect parallelism of development thus exhibited, in these two words, goes far to show that the true interpretation of each has been secured.

POWERFUL MICROSCOPE.—The most powerful microscope ever made has been constructed by Messrs Powell & Lealand, and described in a paper recently read before Royal Society of London. The power of the instrument is fully double that of any which has ever been constructed previously, and it altogether surpasses what had before been considered the utmost attainable limit of perfection in this instrument. This microscope magnifies 3,000 diameters, with its lowest eye-piece, and 15,000 diameters with its highest—the latter being equivalent to making an object appear 1,575,000,000 times larger than it really is. How immensely must such an instrument increase our knowledge of the lower organisms! May it not enable us, eventually, to determine the ultimate constitution of matter?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Jasper District—Mobile Conference.

I am now, on my fourth round, closing out for the Conference year. A part of the third round, and thus far on the fourth, we have had times of refreshing from the Lord; congregations have been large and attentive; altars crowded with serious penitents, and many happily converted, and the work is still going on. I have never seen more glorious manifestations of Divine power and goodness anywhere. The preachers on their several circuits, and missions, in the bounds of this district, have labored in most cases very faithfully, and the result has been, many conversions, and accessions to the church.

I now fear however that some of them will fall considerably short of a support at last. There must be an improvement in the finances, or the pastoral work will be greatly impeded. There has been this year, a considerable revival with us on the subject of Sabbath-schools; but we are greatly in need of Sunday-school books, and many more copies of the Visitor.

The excuse is, no money to buy with; but I fear it is in too many instances the want of a will. Another difficulty with us is, the want of Bibles and Testaments, and there is also a want of hymn books. There are only a few who take any of the Advocate's in this country. I have pressed these demands upon the people; and I am met with this excuse, too poor. We have had still another difficulty here this year.

The missionaries, as they term themselves, from the church North, have in the early part of the year, been laboring very hard, as they say, to effect a union between the church North, and South. And they have been successful to a certain extent; but the element in which they operate most successfully, is about all absorbed, and my opinion is their race is well high run, and upon the whole, I am induced to believe that the M. E. Church South, is in a better condition, morally religiously now, than she was before they came among us. Our membership is more stable now than then; for where you find one of our members now, you find them all right.

So all things being considered, this has been a year, in the which, I have enjoyed more of the peace of God, and the comforts of religion, I think than any year of my life. I have tried to defend the doctrines and discipline of our beloved Methodistism, and to attend to all the duties of my office; and blessed be God, he has been with me to encourage my efforts, and to sanction my efforts; and although I thought at the last Conference when I was appointed to this charge, that it surely was an injudicious one. I now feel that for me, it was the best appointment I ever received from any Bishop, and hereafter I shall not be concerned about my appointment, just willing to leave it altogether to the appointing power, believing it will be right and best. Our district Conference was certainly a success.

Methodist Protestant Church.

Resolution offered and adopted by the Louisiana Annual Conference, of the Methodist Protestant Church, Oct. 19th, 1867.

Rejoicing in the prospects of returning peace and harmony of action, and feeling that the hand of God has been concerned in the very noble and generous concession of their rights and privileges to the Ministry of the M. E. Church South, and reciprocating the friendly and Christian spirit, which has prompted their voluntary offer of aid.

Resolved, that we, as a Conference, respectfully propose, (if the Congress of the said Church shall be so far to concede them) that the propositions of Rev. S. K. Cox, in the Methodist Protestant of the 13th Sept. 1867, be made the basis of action.

But, in the event of their not having that power, we propose to unite with them upon the terms they have proposed, under the condition, that the Churches when united shall be known under the name and style of THE METHODIST CHURCH, leaving all minor points of difference to be settled by future legislation.

Attest. D. J. HENDERSON, Pres.
A. H. BREWER, Sec'y.

Mrs. Editor:—I send you the above resolutions, of the Louisiana Annual Conference, of the Protestant Methodist Church, held at Shady Grove camp ground, Claiborne Parish, relative to the proposed union.

Columbus District Meeting—Mobile Conference.

Mr. Editor:—We were present at a District Meeting of the Columbus District, held at Union Chapel, near Carrollton, Ala., Sept. 26, 27, 28th, ult. The presiding officer was Rev. Wm. Murrah, P. E. The representation in attendance was unusually large, and it was a body of working men.

From the several Reports adopted, we make the following extract. EXTRACT FROM REPORT ON CHURCH LITERATURE.

We note (say the committee) the fact that in circuits embracing from six to a dozen appointments, or churches, numbering their membership by hundreds, the circulation of our Advocate's, rarely exceed some half dozen—hardly a copy to the Church. Why this culpable indifference on the part of our people? It is sometimes said that members of the Church may not have the money to spare. With some this may be true, but not with all who fail to take a religious paper. We see often in the houses of members of the Church, lying on the center-tables, secular papers, such as Magazines, and other forms of light reading. We cannot encourage this discrimination by Methodist people, against the literature of their Church. Bros. Wm. S. Hardy, H. M. Glass, and Geo. R. Kem-brough, were on this committee.

FROM REPORT ON FINANCE.

The want of system, of energy and liberality, on the part of the Stewards themselves, the absence of that zeal and energy that formerly marked the ministers, is the cause of too frequent shameful failures in the financial interest of the Church. No illiberal close-fisted man should ever be appointed to the office of Steward. The amount of the Steward's own assessment of what he ought to give himself, is always carefully noted by the membership at large, and they give accordingly. This we know from observation. The Board of Stewards should from time to time be reorganized under this view. Preachers should visit more. The Steward is often reminded when asking contribution of a member—where is the preacher—have not seen him this year—he has not prayed once in my family. The resolution to assess each member according to his ability, adopted by the Montgomery Conference, for the Support of the Ministry, was accepted here.

The committee on what means should be adopted, for the good of the membership of Freedmen, of which Bro. Thos. P. Crynes, was chairman; made an excellent report, and we regret that it is not at hand, so that we could extract from it.

The Report of Rev. T. P. Crynes, J. B. Stone, and Robert Martin, Committee on Sabbath-schools, and that of Dr. S. F. Hill, G. Hawkins, and J. Lavender, on Church extension, are herewith enclosed to you as they were adopted, with the request that they be condensed and published.

The Conference adjourned on the 28th inst. to meet next year at Brooksville.

Respectfully,

EXTRACT FROM REPORT ON THE STATE OF THE CHURCH.

The preachers generally are at their posts, and both among whites and freedmen, (when they have access to the latter) and laboring with becoming energy and zeal, to build up the Church in all its departments. In many communities, showers of Divine grace have fallen upon the Church, souls have been converted, and accessions made to our ranks, which we trust are but the forshadowings of greater and richer manifestations of Divine power and goodness. This is encouraging. It shows that Divinity, spiritual, life giving power are in the Church still; and indicates too, the duty of both minister and members. If under the outward unfavorable circumstances surrounding us, growing out of the peculiar condition of the country, the demoralized state of society, and the disorganized condition of the Church, consequent upon the war such results as above noticed follow the efforts of some faithful ministers and laymen, what might we expect and realize, if all our embarrassments were removed, the country quiet, and all our militant hosts were fully charged with the electric fires of the Holy Ghost! Here, your committee believe, is the great want of the Church, and our duty in the premises plainly indicated.

1. Resolved, That as Ministers and Laymen, we will do our utmost to revive and spread Scriptural holiness among all our people.

2. Resolved, That the law of the Church respecting regular church-meetings, be faithfully and regularly enforced by every pastor, as the discipline directs.

3. Resolved, That as regards church extension proper, we believe that whenever circumstances justify and there is a prospect of doing good, by establishing additional Sunday-schools, prayer-meetings, and even organizing and building up new Churches and congregations in destitute communities it ought by all means to be done. We ought to keep up our aggressive and missionary spirit. But in view of the almost practical inability of week-day preaching we believe that in many instances, we can more successfully and permanently extend our work, by condensing and concentrating smaller churches and congregations, when they are adjacent, into larger appointments, so as to give Sunday-preaching to the greatest number of our people. All of which is respectfully submitted.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT ON SABBATH SCHOOLS.

We deem it of vital importance to the interest of Christianity, that Sabbath-schools be instituted and persistently maintained in all our Churches.

If it be necessary to establish schools and colleges all over our country, to furnish the minds of our youth, with literary and scientific knowledge, and to prepare them for the several avocations of life; is it not of equal importance to the maintenance of our enlightened Christianity, that the children of our Church, should all be catechumens, and thoroughly instructed in the great cardinal doctrines of Christianity?

Our future position as a Church depends upon our energy here. The Church which controls the religious education of the youth of a community, will command the faith, the patronage, and the support of that community. Thoroughly instruct our children that they may not only understand our doctrines, but be able to defend them, and we are safe. Gather up the children of our godless neighbors from the high ways, and instruct them here, and the chances are that they will be ours and God's forever.

Your committee therefore present the following resolutions.

1. Resolved, That it is the duty of our preachers and people, to organize and maintain Methodist Sabbath-schools, wherever it is practicable.

2. Resolved, That where it is not thought advisable to organize separate Methodist schools, from paucity of members, or want of teachers. In view of the great importance of religious instruction, that we unite with other orthodox Christians, to maintain a Sabbath-school.

All of which we respectfully submit to the consideration of the Conference.

Plaquemine Brule—La. Conference.

DEAR ADVOCATE:—The year 1867 will not soon be forgotten in this community. It has so far, been a very long year. Events, states of mind, etc., innumerable, have lengthened its days and hours—many have counted its minutes. The worm ruined the somewhat brightening prospects of the farmer, and cut off preachers, merchants, lawyers, and doctors, from many an expected and needed dollar. The radical worked badly in the field and so the corn fell short of what might have been made, though there is enough for home use.

We had some excitement once, because of reports that the Rad's intended to kill the whites! But if any such idea was ever really entertained by them, it came to nought; perhaps because of the prompt action of the whites.

Sickness has been in every family in the neighborhood during the last three months. Conjestion has prevailed extensively. More sickness than for many years before. The afflictions of this people have indeed been severe.

The yellow fever has been bad in Washington, and has also got into Opelousas. I learn that Bro. Adams in W. has proved himself a true soldier of Jesus in his ministrations to the sick. Bro. Wilkinson in Opelousas, has also been true to that part of a minister's work. We have had no cases so far: very likely will not, though some feel a little alarm.

What will some of the Moreau Church think, when they hear that Bro. Bradley has made by his own labor, over 300 bushels of corn, besides potatoes, etc., upon which to live and preach to his people next year! His church is poor and has paid him nothing. How can the Northern Church absorb or buy such men as that?

Negro labor is becoming—it has become, a farce! Farmers here are employing (when they can) white men. They furnish them, land, house, fuel, and pay all expenses. The employee does the labor and furnishes his own food, and receives half the crop. This affords good chance to men without means to get a start. I am sure that industrious men can do well here by such arrangements. There are a number who would employ one or two single men of good habits, and furnish all things, including board, and give half of what they make. Young men might begin a successful farmer's life by coming here this winter, and entering into such contracts. If men of the above description will write or come to me, I will give them information, or help them all I can.

In religious matters we are a little depressed. We have had much to try our firmness. Still matters in this respect are not very discouraging. We have much to make us glad. Some may be cold, but there is considerable piety. Preachers and people are far less prosperous, financially, than once, yet our Churches are well attended, and some money is here and there, raised for the work of God.

I sometimes receive letters from North Louisiana asking about this country. I wish to make one suggestion to all in that section who propose coming here. It is this—unless they have means to buy improved places, they would do well to form a company of five or six, or more families, and send one or two to select and purchase a tract of land large enough for all, then move down with all their stock, and together "knock up" cabins, to live in till they can do better. Several families in possession of but little cash, moved here last year, and finding improved places hard to get (within their means) either stuck down in some unpleasant place, or turned back where they came from, with very great loss. Five or six families, each having $200 to $400, can together buy a tract of fair land, upon which they can settle with hope of competency and comfort after awhile. They must bring their own labor. Negroes no better here than elsewhere.

The 54th session of the Tennessee Annual Conference closed at Clarksville, Tenn., October 30th, after a very interesting deliberation of the body for eight days. The presidency of Bishop Paine proved very satisfactory to the preachers and people, both in the conference room and cabinet. We were much pleased with his pleasant mood and affable manners during the entire session, and the wisdom and impartiality displayed in the appointment of the preachers. The privilege of extending the pastorate, has thus far effected but little practically in our conference. Of thirty-one station preachers, one has been returned the third year, and he a transfer from Missouri, a young man of great usefulness; five return the second year; so you see we are still itinerants in the Tennessee Conference. The change on the circuits has not been so great, but considerably indicative of the itinerant spirit; I remember none who return the third year. Our spiritual prosperity is full of encouragement, a net increase of near four thousand members, during the year, fully a gain of ten percent. A new District has been formed adjoining the Montgomery, Georgia and Holston Conferences, and manned with self-sacrificing young men of piety and promise. Our territory and number of laborers are both enlarging. Twenty-one were admitted on trial and a few re-admitted into the conference.

Among other important matters brought before our conference, was a plan to organize an Aid Society, to furnish assistance for worthy young men desiring an education, preparatory to entering the Christian ministry. The paper was presented by Dr. D. C. Kelly, the last evening of the conference session. Owing to the importance of the measure, prominent members of the conference proposed deferring action upon the subject for one year, as we had but little time to discuss the provisions of the plan; but a lay member of superior intellect and commanding influence espoused the bill, and eloquently urged its immediate adoption, taking as a text for his able argument, the objection offered "the importance of the measure," required there should be no delay. The plan was adopted, and without effort or previous intention. Between and eight thousand dollars subscribed by those present, a spontaneous expression of enthusiasm; felt in the inauguration of the grand enterprise of ministerial education. No Theological School or equip of Biblical Literature is proposed; but simply a society of members subscribing one hundred dollars, each to be paid to annual installments of ten dollars. The Parent Society to have a President, Secretary and Treasurer, at Nashville, and one Presiding Elder, District Secretary, and one or two auxiliary societies, with a view of doing good to all our members, and to their own districts.

The beneficiaries are to be recommended by respective quarterly conferences and their cases considered by an auxiliary society, to whom application for aid is made, and if desired assistance is granted, is given by the recipient to the school, and he enters the conference, he receives credit of one hundred dollars each year of regular ministerial labor in the conference, until the note is cancelled. In the event of failure to enter or continue in the work, the aid furnished is returned to the society. The members of our conference are members of the society.

I give from memory, the items of the plan; it will be published soon, if I make any you can then correct the errors. A few moments by the preachers, will furnish a fund of or eight hundred dollars, enough to keep three years at school—all the while.

people and preachers will ward the enterprise properly out any extra efforts, enough to be secured to keep twenty youths at school all the while an annual accession of ten educated young men into our conference, who otherwise would enjoy such educational advantages. Set our whole church a-agoing to the importance of the undertaking! All agree in ing the demand for an ministry. Who will not ten dollars annually, for such pose? Our missionary small; conference collection ably good, and Bishop's claim off.

The lay representatives elected here, and are working two leading physicians, from Clarksville, Ala., and vicinity, all the time. The lay success thus far with influence will be felt in the trust. A larger proportion of representatives were in than clerical members. Methodism was never more spiritual and successful than at the present. God is in person. S. A. I.

GEORGE MULLER.

George Muller, the founder of the Orphan Asylum, Bristol, England, has expended $2,750,000, penny of which was sent to him, and without solicitation 1,200 orphan children in charge, occupying five large houses, each distinct from others. The following description is from the Boston correspondence:

He lives in the simplest style, does not allow himself a rocking chair unless he is ill. He was a poor man when he was a poor man today, he has handled millions of dollars and could have spent it all as he pleased. He is a Prussian, and was in 1805. He was in the army. He was very rich, was converted by some plays of grace, and he devoted himself from that hour to the poor. He is a tall, with the bearing of a soldier, dark hair and gray whiskers, a black frock coat buttoned neck, and a white cravat collar. He speaks with a strong, and full of Christ. He is of great executive ability, sole manager of this immense establishment. It would be to any government on the earth. I have talked with the people of Bristol about the merchants, tradesmen, and storemen and all classes, and irreligious—and they press the highest confidence in his integrity and his model men of the world. He is that; that God is in prayer; that he is the same God that he ever was; that believes and this he trusts never been disappointed.

An exchange says it requires 1,000,000 per annum to keep 100,000 of the United States, 10,000 for the criminals, 10,000 for the dogs, and 6,000,000 for the clergyman, yet there is more doing over the last expense than the others put together.

ABOARD THE ANGLICAN.

A NATURAL BALLAD FOR THE TIMES.

A driving-bark on an ocean dark, Peter at the fore;
Hailed another driving bark, Like her, labored sore.

"What the Anglican, ahoy?"
"Ay, what ship are you?"
"A Roman bark, the Church's ark!"
"What cheer?" "Bad. Yours?" "Bad, too."

"We lost our course; our binnacle, Compass and light, is floundered—Call out of the h-atropes blown,
And an spare suit aboard."

"My shoals that hide beneath the tide, My rocks above that show;
My reefs, on our lee beam, My sands below."

"You stuck! Ye Britons to our pumps—Kick to them, phrises, too long;
You lost your way to lead and log—Well, perhaps, too strong."

"—though with the mitre marked Anglican Broad arrow)— And log—what'er their Church, Is Low, Broad or Narrow—"

"We mean the means to face the storm As gales as both encreasing; We, they say in well-set sails, Tackle, and bold steering."

"Half our crew says, 'Here's the coney!'
'Other half says, 'There!'
And captain, half by one, Half by 'other, swear,

"We've signalled, far and wide, Anglicans, ahoy!"
"How to work the ship, How about light or buoy?"

"We decide what coat of paint To look the bravest in To gild her figure-head, To keep her under pin;

"Then we'll fall to saying prayers,
And the dead lights to;
That doesn't save the ship, Now not what we'll do!" [Pouch.

THREE GREAT FEASTS OF ISRAEL.

Of the religious festivals of the ancient Hebrew people, we are accustomed to distinguish three by the epithet "Great"; namely, the Feast of Pentecost, the Feast of Tabernacles, and the Feast of the Passover. In the course of the year Israelite was directed by law to present himself at the great metropolis, and hold these observances there "before the Lord." Let us dwell upon each by itself awhile, before proceeding to consider the "Pillars of Feasts," as they are exclusively termed in the Talmud.

The Land of Israel, about one hundred and forty miles by forty, coming breadth from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, and of the two and a half Jordanic tribes, was of the size of six average English counties, Jerusalem being considerably from the centre, three times further from the upper extremity than from the lower; so that we have a good idea of the relation which required the Jewish fathers, brothers, and sons to present themselves here for religious celebration thrice in a year. If we can suppose all the men of Kent, Sussex, Hants, Wilts, Dorset, had assembled at Winchester, with coaches or railroads, every Christmas (supposing that a smattering of the Jews, and White, spending a week in that each occasion. So remarkable, hardly comprehensible in our different circumstances, raises our curiosity to discover what was the main idea underlying it, and what useful end it meant to serve.

The first place then it is to be asked that we shall understand very little of this, unless we realize with some distinctness, that Jerusalem was in the sacred city of Israel: for our own religious capitals can here suggest a feeble parallel. We must not forget that Jerusalem (or wherever the ark and the altar were located before the reign of Solomon) was the only place in the whole world where the authorized worship of God was conducted, and where alone it was possible to be conducted. Let us for a moment try to imagine that Winchester Cathedral was the sole church for the multitude of parishes between the Thames and the Channel in these six counties before named, and that in this edifice alone the proper ritual of worship could be observed, all the other religious assemblies, Sunday by Sunday, being held only in the parish schools, or in buildings nothing like a cathedral city would gather round, and what such a spot would become as a religious centre to all the counties round. But

Jerusalem was in point of fact a vast deal more to Israel than this, the chief reason of which lies in the typical nature of the service there celebrated. The Temple worship was one prolonged and elaborate symbol; a representation in figure of the mysteries of Sacrifice, Atonement, Intercession, Prayer, Sanctification, and everything that we understand under the name of Redemption. In all regal stateliness, with all the splendor of an unique national observance, this great drama was perpetually going forward. One altar of grand dimensions, surrounded with all the glories of architecture, and ministered at by troops of robed priests;—one Holy of Holies, inhabited by the Ark and the Cherubim and the Tables of the Covenant—the pledge of God's presence with and kingship over them;—these gave the services their entire significance; and such a ritual as this, with such accessories necessary for its observance, could not be repeated, and its dignity lowered by feeble editions in the various tribal capitals, and it was the strict command of God that this never should be attempted. In every town and village the people might meet in their prayer-houses or synagogues to hear the law and recite their prayers; but altar and temple there were, and there could be, but one. The importance then of a visit to this single centre of a worship was greatly enhanced. The children of God's Covenant were not to live forgetful of the grand ideas of their symbolic religion by being too much out of sight of it. They were to feel that it all deeply concerned them, that they themselves were represented at the altar by their ministering brethren. There were doctrines, as it were in hieroglyphic, portrayed on that one spot and nowhere else. The spiritual world was there set forth in material lines, and those blessed gates were to be to them the very gates of heaven. There were on that august altar on the rock of Jerusalem, and there alone, arose the true flame to heaven among all the impure and unaccepted fires that lighted up the various groves about them and every city of the world, and Israel was invited to draw near and see this great sight three times in the year: while all that they witnessed there was to dwell in their souls as an affectionate memory when they returned home to their families, keeping alive in them that sense of privilege and dignity which justly belonged to a people favored, for the whole world's sake, with the revelation of heavenly truth. Nor should it be lost sight of that the comparative distance of this symbolical manifestation from the bulk of the nation would prevent its being too common and too familiar a thing. The heavenly divinities were under every green tree; but the signs of the presence of the Lord God were, like sovereign majesty, to be read of, to be reported, and on solemn occasions to be visited. All must flock to His Court, and win their way into His presence, by efforts and pains. And while the dignity of His name would thus advance, the consciousness of the unity of His nature would also grow, as the being who was revealed in one spot, by one ritual—the pattern of His own appointment, to be neither repeated nor imitated elsewhere, and to be shared with no other claimant.

We may form a conception of the outward aspect of these journeyings from all that we have read of the eastern caravans as practiced at this day for religion or trade, and the medieval pilgrimages to Palestine or to the popular saints at Christendom. Several days would be consumed on the journey out and home, for the more distant inhabitants, beside the seven or eight which the festival lasted, so that parties would journey with preconcerted arrangements and in organized bands—neighbors and friends from the same town or district, the "kindsfolk and acquaintance" of the Gospel narrative, being fellow-travelers. As they carried with them tents for their lodging by night, and all their necessities, there would be a considerable amount of baggage, and whatever arrangements might be needed for their accommodation would be developed, both in the capital and on the road, by long established custom. If we could imagine ourselves on the towering summit of Hermon, overlooking the entire scene—as a popular writer on Hindostan graphically places the spectator on the summit of the Himalayas, taking a bird's-eye of the whole peninsula—we should observe the various trains of wayfarers at different points, north, south, east, and west of the land; some fording the Jordan, some threading the valleys, some climbing the steep, and all converging to one spot, reviving their spirits as they catch a nearer and nearer view on every successive eminence they reach of their sacred city and its majestic Temple. If we were sufficiently near them to hear, we might find some beguiling the road by such devices as the old English poet describes with his Canterbury Pilgrims, but the more devout would be reciting the words of one of the songs of Zion:—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! my soul longeth, yea, even fainteth, for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, in whose heart are the ways: who passing through the vale of Baca make it a well, the rain filleth the pools. They go from strength to strength, every one of them in Zion appeareth before God." In which language David seems to be picturing the festival pilgrimage, while himself, though "anointed," cut off from the courts he loved so much. We might also hear, perhaps, such strains as these:—"I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within the gates, O Jerusalem! Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together, whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks to the name of the Lord. For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sakes I will now say, Peace be within thee. Because of the house of the Lord our God, I will seek thy good."

WORSHIP OF THE CHURCH—JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN.

BY THE REV. DR. LOVICK PIERCE.

I see in your Advocate of the 31st inst. an article in reply to Beta, on instrumental music in our churches, as I suppose. Now I do not seek to intermeddle in this controversy, on account of the music question itself, but on account of the Church question involved in it.

It is necessary to set aside the Jewish Church, as the Church of God, in order to be divinely freed from the legitimacy of using suitable musical instruments in Church service, it costs more than I feel at liberty to pay for the triumph.

The Jewish Church, as an organized Church, in its temple-service, did not fall within those sacrifices and ceremonies which were typical, and were nailed to the cross, and taken out of the way when their great Antitype suffered and died on it. Neither circumcision nor the passover was nailed to the cross. They were sacramental in the original Church of God—the Church in the wilderness. They were transmittable, and passed over into the Christian Church, under other simpler names and forms. But they could not have come into the Christian Church as sacraments, unless they had been sacramental in their origin and design. Nor could they have come into the Church of God as its sacraments, under the Christian dispensation, unless they had been ordained for this use in the original Church of God, under the Jewish dispensation. And if this is true, the Christian Church is not a new original institution, but is the development of the original Church of God, as it was originated under the stipulations of the Abrahamic covenant; which covenant was confirmed of God in Christ four hundred and thirty years before any of the sacrificial and ceremonial services of the Jewish Church were ever inaugurated, as typical foreshadowings of the sacrifice of the Lamb of God as the true Paschal Lamb. Hence this commemorative ordinance was instituted coincidently with the redemption of God's covenant people by actual divine interposition. The passover, therefore, was instituted prior to any of the several parts of the ceremonial law, as provided for the representative services of the tabernacle and temple; and it did of right, as a sacramental institution, exist, independently of all merely sacrificial offerings. These sacraments of the Church in the wilderness were not nailed to the cross to be taken out of the way, but were transmitted into the abiding sacraments of the Christian Church in baptism and the Lord's Supper. And to me it is not without much moral force that the Protestant Church, after much conflict with the Church of Rome on the question of sacraments, settled down satisfactorily upon only two sacraments in the Church—as of divine origin and divine sanction and obligation.

I repeat again, brethren should take care not to enslave the Scriptures of the Jewish Church, in their moral and spiritual teachings, so as to consider these abrogated; because the legal sacrifices of a ceremonial economy were abrogated after their schoolmaster service was done—faith itself having found its true object. Every one knows how Christ himself magnified and confirmed the evangelism of the Old Testament Scriptures, embracing them all in the terms law, psalms, and prophets. The New Testament recognizes the moral and religious obligation of the tithe-law, and of the offering of the first-fruits unto the Lord; showing, as I conceive, that those institutions in the economy of the Jewish Church, which were established to elevate and sanctify the Lord God in the hearts of his worshippers, are of perpetual obligation. Else I do not see why St. Paul should have said: "Whatsoever was written aforetime was written for our learning." For I do not see how those things that have filled their course in the divine economy, and have ceased by divine limitation to make any demand on us for practical compliance, can remain over as texts from which we are still to learn.

But if whatever pertained to moral principal and spiritual worship in the Jewish Church remains for ever of force, as I conceive it does, then I can see how it was written for our learning. It is enough for me, however, to learn from Christ in his Sermon on the Mount, when he enjoined upon his Church the most difficult duty in the calendar of moral obligations, the doing to others as we would others should do unto us, that this duty is deduced from what is written in the law and in the prophets. Christ never insinuated at any time that he came to set up a religion any better in its moral principles or godly inspirations than those inculcated in the law, in the psalms, and in the prophets. Can any one find, in all the New Testament, any instance wherein the key-notes of a holy, fervid devotion, are tuned up to a loftier scale of divine worship than in the book of Psalms? The silence of the New Testament on the order of this part of public worship argues in my mind no revocation. What was to cease in the general form of outward worship did cease, and due notice was taken of it. But whatever in the way of order in the temple-worship was not significantly revoked, I should say remains as what may be. I do not regard the simple order of public temple-service, as programmed by Jehovah in this instance, as amounting to a requisition or order that must be filled up literally like the parts of a watch, to enable it to run at all. The devotional service may bring in all that can sound God's praise, and no doubt ought to levy it on all that we take delight in ourselves, without the immediate use of some thing which, if used, would make it no less an acceptable service, and might even make it more acceptable, if all the spiritual ingredients of heavenly worship were in full play. Thus I give it as my opinion that whatever God appointed to be used in his praise, in the order of this service, was appointed, not as a ceremony or symbol, but as a service perpetually right, and acceptable in his public sanctuary service, when used for his holy praise. It was therefore unnecessary to re-enact the law providing this order, for the singing part of the worshiping assemblies of Jehovah in the Church. The whole comes to this issue: If God could be praised through instruments then, he can be now; and if he can be, he ought to be. It is a false policy that would surrender the charm and power of music entirely to theaters, operas, circuses, and dances. These entertainments all owe much of their glory to the spell of music, vocal and instrumental. And knowing the enthusiasm kindled by music in favor of the object for which it is specially enlisted, it is the duty, as well as the interest of the Church, to renece music, both vocal and instrumental, as much as possible from the inflaming of fleshly lusts and passions, back again to the inspirations of those anthems of rapturous praise, the utterances of which we have left to us in the Psalms of David, portions of which were chanted by this majestic choir in the temple.

Here let me say, that while the very order of things appointed in the temple-music are not named in the directions given to the Christian Church on the subject of singing, for this is its appropriate name; still Paul, who justly passed by any mention of the instruments in use, because they were unconscious, passive things, and as such unrevokable, and as I have already intimated, immaterial to the accept-ableness of spiritual praise, men alone sing, and what could alone make melody in the heart unto the Lord. But in both of these cases the singing of psalms is mentioned as a part of our poetic composition. And all must feel as I do, that the fact of singing psalms, as a part of their congregational singing, must have come from the temple-service singing.

But some one will say it is mentioned only as singing, without any allusion to playing on instruments. Well, because instruments were passive, and could not praise God only as the performers employed them in this delightful work. But every one will see that the music issuing from the organ is just as divine as that from the lips, if it is used from the same heavenly motive.

There are other reasons why I do not like this manner of getting away from scriptural conclusions. It attempts to unfair views. The temple of God at Jerusalem, as I conceive, symbolized both the Church on earth and in heaven. Wherefore, in the final revelation, as John saw it, the rapturous enjoyments of the triumphant hosts in heaven consists in singing the new song and harping upon their harps. This triumphant multitude he saw standing on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. I cannot see the source of sensible application in these visions, only in the temple-worship, by association. Therefore, if harps had been combined with singing in the celebration of God's praise on earth, it was meet to represent his everlasting and worship in heaven, as going on in the same delightful strains. Heavenly worship is all in praise, and honor, and glory.

Having offered my objections to the views of the reply to Beta, which I have done only with the desire to give a new turn to the discussion, I beg to say that the question whether the introduction of melodeons and organs into Methodist churches shall or shall not be allowed, is settled. They that are in cannot be put out, and many more will come in. It is a question which the General Conference cannot with propriety legislate in nor out of the Church. The right of the order of public worship, as to choirs, with or without an instrument, is with the Churches, and any attempt to take it away by making it wrong by law, would do Methodism more injury than the voluntary introduction of a melodeon into every church in every Conference would do it, if introduced, as it would be to add strength and beauty to the singing of God's praise. And what the General Conference would not dare to attempt, discontented minorities ought not. To prove from Scripture that God cannot be praised through the consecrated use of an organ in the Church, is impossible; and therefore all fuss made about it on this ground, is not only useless, but damaging to Methodism.

But there is a ground that may be, and must be taken, against their abuse. They are being used too much for the glorifying of music as a science. The voluntaries too often come upon my feelings only as a musical performance, and chill my spiritual emotions. More if desired.

From the Land we Leave.
TROPICAL STAPLES LOST.

We have conversed with planters from all parts of the Cotton States, and they all concur in this, that they cannot raise cotton at the present price, and pay the tax, and that they will not attempt it another year. Now we are very fully impressed with the belief that the Government cannot do without the products of the South, and it becomes the part of enlightened Statesmanship to restore the agriculture of the South to something like its former condition. The rice of 1860 amounted to 187,140,173 lbs. Georgia and Carolina alone furnished two-thirds the export trade of the world. That export trade is entirely destroyed, and rice from China, has actually been sold in Charleston Harbor. The cotton of 1860 amounted to 5,196,944 bales. It has fallen to 2,019,271 bales in 1866, and is destined to a greater decline, and it may be to extinction.

The sugar crop of 1860 was 305,205 hogsheds. Last year, it was 80,000 and this year it will be less. The tobacco crop of 1860 was 429,363,761 lbs. It has had a similar, though not so great, a decline. Pitch, tar and turpentine, cypress shingles, live oak timber, hemp, flax, wheat, and generally all Southern products have been fearfully reduced. The great West has almost totally lost its Southern market for corn, miles, horses, hogs, &c. Thousands in the rice producing region of the United States have been kept from actual want by the generous charity of the manufacturing or non-producing section of our vast country. How long can the United States afford to have its producers turned into paupers? Is a period of her history has the South showed greater energy than during the last two disastrous years. Without money, without credit, without permanent labor, and under the depression of unfriendly legislation, she has repaired her waste places, built up her burnt towns and villages, restored her torn up railroads, started once more her schools and colleges, and so cultivated her soil as to furnish three-fourths of the exports of the country. This agricultural labor has been carried on where levees had been out exposing to inundations, where fences had been burnt, implements of husbandry destroyed, and horses and mules so scarce that men and even women have pulled the plough by hand. Is there not enough here to excite the admiration of the most malignant philanthropist? Is there not enough here to suggest the thought that the South, with friendly legislation and a generous helping hand, would soon afford once more a market for the West, and impart confidence to the credit of the Government? The products of the South even now constitute almost the sole exports of the country, and therefore almost the sole hope of establishing the currency upon a sure basis! Northern men, who have attempted the cultivation of Southern farms, have generally made miserable failures. The Southern people, of course, understand the culture of their own staples and the management of their own system of labor better than the rest of the world can. Hence, enlightened self-interest should prompt the North and West to give it a wise encouragement to Southern planters by a fair and equal legislation, imposing upon them no heavier burdens than they themselves are willing to bear. No man of sense doubts that the agriculture of the South built up the great cities of the North and made the whole United States rich and prosperous. No one at all conversant with statistics, doubts that upon rescuing the South depends the only hope of maintaining the credit of the government at home and abroad. The rich bond-holders, the merchant princes, the farmers, the mechanics,—all classes and conditions are interested in Southern prosperity. The party that devises unjust and unequal legislation for that section will surely be pushed to the wall. Self-interest will in the long run get the better of hate and prejudice. However willing to the loyal North may be to see the rebellious South punished, the loyal North is not willing to see ruin brought to her own border to accomplish that object. We think that the day is not distant when the American people will see that they are paying too dear for their whistle of negro equality. If we estimate the bale of cotton at one hundred dollars, the payment last year in the reduced production of cotton amounted to three hundred and seventeen millions, seven hundred and seventy-four thousand, three hundred dollars! ($317,774,300.) Assuming that the loss upon all the other products of the South is equal to that upon cotton, we paid last year $635,548,600 for this ebony whistle. How long will the people be willing to sustain this annual loss? A voice has reached our little backwoods village on this 9th October morning, coming from Pennsylvania and Ohio, "this is the last year of folly!" So may it be.

"PLANS."

We are almost sick of the word. Some people are always planning. They have been planning for years. They always have some grand plan on hand, and are full of talk about it. But they do nothing, or next to nothing. It is all planning, but no doing. They look afar off and speculate of great things that might be done, but leave undone the things which lie right under their eyes and convenient to their hands. Do what lies next to you, and every day will develop its own providential plan as you go along. The fact is, you cannot plan ahead of your performance. By this we mean to say, God will not endorse any plans that look to future service in the neglect of present duty. Go to day and work in my vineyard, is His command. To-day's work will be made plain—so will that to-morrow. So will the work of the whole life, if you do every allotted task as it is providentially placed before you. God will plan for you if you will work for Him. Therefore take no (anxious) thought for the morrow, but work to-day, and the Master will plan for you and see that you fail not of your present duty. —C. H. S. Spectator.

RENEW.

If any of our subscribers, whose year is about to terminate, hesitate from any cause, to renew their subscription, we suggest that the whole family be consulted, before the thing is finally determined. If the old man does not quite approve of everything said in the Advocate, during the last fifty-two weeks, it is quite likely that the old lady can suggest one or two good things she has seen in it, which will more than balance the objection—and we appeal to the old lady. Some of our most patient readers are children, so we hear. These children have a great deal to learn yet, of matters long since known to us. And, as a man will sometimes tell the same story over for their sake, a little allowance must be made, for the young people; a paper that is tame to us, may to them be new and sprightly. A good natured visitor, coming in once a week, and saying a good deal that ought to be said to different parties about the house, can do little harm, and saves much talking. Also, consult the preacher.

But in all cases the Advocate will be discontinued when the subscription runs out, if not renewed. This is we believe not only the best for us, but the most satisfactory course to our subscribers.—The epidemic has doubtless kept many of our correspondents away from towns and post offices. We hope that they will now promptly forward us the names of all renewals and send the money with them—in the same letter.

This suits us a great deal better than keeping accounts and collecting the amount at Conference.

GILES COUNTY.

Our Tennessee correspondent, in writing from the Tennessee Conference, mentions a county which has sent six young men to be received on trial as preachers in that Conference. He then gives the average number of individuals contributed to the ministry annually by that county: and it is surprising how much it has yielded in that noblest of all gifts to the cause of Christ—those 'Sons of the Morning' who preach glad tidings of good things. Upon so marked a fact he ventures a reflection 'why is it that our cities send so few ministers from their churches?' This putting 'Giles County' in comparison with 'our cities' at once creates an interest in Giles. We are curious to know more of it. The writer further says, that one of our Bishops came from it, and adds: truly Giles County is the nursery of our Conference. We have often wondered where that Tennessee hive was, that sent out so many preachers into all the length and breadth of this valley. We wish he had gone further—what kind of soil has it, rich or poor, clayey or sandy? is it traversed with small streams—is its population dense or sparse—are there many towns in it, or is it all country? what gave Methodism such a start and hold there, and what is at work there now, that so many are called out of it to the work of the ministry? Then one desires to know whether Giles County is equally famous in every good word and work. Do they give there too—do they pour their money into the Lord's treasury as freely as they give their sons to the gospel? we have been looking for some country region of which we could say, the Lord hath made it; a land liberal in all good things, bountiful to the poor, full of schools, of protracted meetings, full of ardor for the spreading of Christ's kingdom beyond 'the river' to the 'ends of the earth' supporting its pastors, sending forth its missionaries, taking care of its young people—a class-meeting, prayer-meeting, Love feast, and Camp-meeting body of Methodists, who like Wesley, are only anxious to live right, to have a Christian burial, and "die not having ten pounds left."

With grace abundantly endowed A pure believing multitude!

Alas! we have no such county in the South-west. We have a scattering of good people here and there, but nothing that approaches a model. Our lands are fertile, but our stock is disappearing; our levees and fences are out of repair; the negroes are bent on mischief, the face of the country is traversed with uneasy water courses; and between taxes and caterpillars, there is but little left, for either school house or Church. We go to meeting when we can, pray as best we can, give what we can, endure all we can, and hope as much as we can; but we are in no mood for attempting anything exemplary: Our utmost prayer just now is 'Lead us not into temptation.' So much for the country. Our towns and cities have their own helps and needs. They have preaching every Sunday, Church-meeting Monday, Class-meeting Tuesday, Prayer-meeting Wednesday, Love-meeting Thursday, Teacher's meeting Friday, and Choir-meeting Saturday—meetings enough. But yet rents are high, money scarce, politics threatening, negroes idle, business stagnant, prospects gloomy, population crowding in, and it is difficult to tell which scourge has been the severer upon them, the freedmen's bureau, or the yellow fever. The having sent preachers forth is a good thing, if it do not abide alone. This city, which religiously we suppose ought not to be mentioned with Giles County, has also sent forth preachers: twenty-five preachers have been recommended to the Annual Conference, from New Orleans in the last 22 years, as travelling preachers. Of them five died in the work; seven have located, and twelve are still actively engaged in the Itinerant work—and all, but one, are members of the Louisiana Conference.

OUR COTTON FUTURE.

"Cotton knows no politics," is the significant motto of the Cotton Supplying Association of England. In this country, we can say conversely that politics knows no cotton. While the Statesmen of Great Britain, the Bank of England, and the Association of English Manufacturers and Merchants are combining, and organizing, and calling into action all their influence and wisdom to foster the production of cotton, the government of the United States, the manufacturers, and merchants of the North, and the politicians of the East and West, have been actively employed, and are still, in breaking up our culture and trade, and monopoly of this great staple.

Ten years ago an association was formed in Great Britain, for the sole purpose of increasing the quantity, and regularity, and certainty of its supply to English manufacturers. Fearing lest the production of it should suddenly terminate in America, by the prevalence of the abolition sentiment, and the agriculture of the South share the fate of Jamaica, this Society began a correspondence, which now "extends to sixty fields scattered over the four quarters of the globe, where cotton is capable of being grown to an unlimited extent." It has sent out agents, cotton seed, experienced planters, improved ploughs, and guns; it has besieged the Home Government, the East India Directors, the Provincial Governors, and the native village cotton farmers; has ransacked every point of the compass, and pried into every spot of the tropical and temperate earth which might sprout cotton; its agents have penetrated Africa; and by way of episode merely, have discovered the Sources of the Nile, and determined the geologic character of its great basin; it has exhumed the nations and centre of a whole continent in searching for a cotton field to supply Manchester. It has done in ten years about ten times as much labor in the service of this enterprise as has been done by missionary effort for the salvation of the heathen. The success of this well directed labor has been great. It enabled England's manufacturers to pass the centre during the late War of the States, and furnishes the true explanation of the independence of the world upon the South for cotton.

Ten years ago, Peru contributed but 400 bales to the market of Great Britain; last year it sent 50,000 bales. India in 1850 furnished cotton to the value of one and three quarter million sterling; last year, the value of the cotton furnished by that country was thirty seven and a half ($37½) million sterling. In 1865, Egypt sent 413,000 bales, and Turkey 80,000. That the product of these countries was greatly stimulated by our war is evident, for the India field this year yields but 1,450,000 bales against 1,847,000 in 1865. So Egypt this year, yields but 167,000 bales, against 413,000 in 1865; and Turkey yields but 33,000, against 80,000 in 1865. The expectation is, that next year the quantity and the quality of India cottons will be superior to that of any year. India, it is reasonable to say, will send to Liverpool next year, more cotton than the Southern States raise.

In looking at the future of cotton in this part of the country, it would be well to keep these facts in mind. Its production must steadily decrease in the South for the want of labor. The argument that if the slave raised five bales for another, the freedman would certainly raise ten for himself, has not been verified. The reasoning was defective which argued from what a man was made to do, to what he would do of his own will, from an organized to a disorganized system. If a disciplined body of men will effect so much; how much will a mob do? or as a New England man would put it, if case-loving Southern planters and ignorant negroes will do so much! how much more will an intelligent freedman, and New England enterprise do? We refer to Gen. Banks, who was a large cotton planter during 1863 and '64, for the answer. We think that the experience of that astute military man, politician and planter, will bear us out in saying, that if a slave raised five bales of cotton, a free negro will raise two, and a Bureau negro nothing. The Parliament of Great Britain has demonstrated that all arguments based upon the enterprise and labor of the negro, are to be received with caution. The philanthropists of 1832, looked forward to grand results upon the emancipation of the West India laborer, which as yet have not been realized. And the industrial history of the same scheme, and the same policy, will in this country not be especially better.

Our manufacturing, commercial, and mercantile interests have rested largely upon this cotton product, probably to a greater extent than we can now realize.

The three elements of our prosperity have been, the Negro, the Anglo American enterprise, and a Tropical climate. These three in combination, gave us the control of the commerce and the markets of the world. Any two of these elements, without the third, are worthless; and unless there can be some organization discovered, by which all three can be made to work in harmony, the American people have surrendered the valuable products of the Tropics to the English people, and to the muscle of the Cooley. One hundred and fifty millions of twiney slaves of the Government of Great Britain, will in India, soon make enough cotton for us, and for the whole world.

COMPLAINTS.

We once asked an old seaman, in what the charm of "life on the ocean wave" consisted—that it seemed to us the 'dullest thing in nature—only a sort of vegetation—an irksome existence with an abiding smell of bilge-water, one hour differing from another only in the bells of the watch. He replied that the interest of a sailor's life consisted in the storms. So disturbance of the even tenor of a newspaper office, by frequent and hearty complaints, lends it a fascinating charm. The Post-office is a fruitful source of this pleasant excitement; so is the carrier, 'who has not delivered the paper in three weeks'; so too the brilliant, rising, but unappreciated poet of the family; so the plain-spoken Brother, 'who never has been able to get all he wrote printed as he wrote it'; the Controversialist, who thinks all pious men, these days, should eat and sleep with visor down; the feverish neophyte, fruitful in 'Constitutions' of 'Societies'—'the duty of the secretary shall be, &c.'—who sees a great apathy in the public mind; and the never failing Agent whose 'Reports' are allowed to stand by themselves 'half murdered'; these all have, their own views of what a religious paper should be, and of the Advocate. They turn away from it—almost disgusted!

Gentlemen; you are the life of the office, if you only knew it; when you quit, we shall feel like quitting. Do not be discouraged, send on that everlasting poetry marked 'original' and 'dedicated to'—we have a little eye-sight left and cannot lose it in a better cause: send on those interminable District Meeting Resolutions, and Reports, solemn as a church, and uniform as a mill—we have still some strength at the service of all the Districts; send on those interesting little treatises on the "Subject" and the "Mode"—we are always in want of something new; send them all on—each one two or three galleys long—and never send with them one single subscriber—if you want a good notice.

A conference of Sunday-school, representatives, from more than forty cities and towns, met at Birmingham, England, on the 2d. and 3d. October, to discuss the means of making Sunday-schools and Sunday-school unions more powerful agents for the improvement of the social, moral, and religious condition of the people.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

The order which displaced Gen. Hays, and put Mr. C. Bullitt in the office of Sheriff of the Parish of Orleans, has been revoked; as the following announces.

HEADQUARTERS, DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA, New Orleans, La., Nov. 4, 1867.
[Extract.]
2. Cuthbert Bullitt, Esq., having reconsidered his acceptance and declined the appointment of Sheriff of the Parish of Orleans, paragraph 2 of special orders No. 176, current series, from these headquarters, is hereby revoked.
By command of Brevet Major General Joseph A. Mower.

GEO. L. HARTSUFF, A. A. G.
Official: NATHANIEL BURMAN, 2d. Lieut. 37th Inf., A. A. G.

Doubtless the private history included in the "reconsideration" of Mr. Bullitt, will one day transpire.

JEFFERSON CITY.

The semi-monthly meeting of the Council of Jefferson City, was held on Monday evening, the 4th inst. This Council has just been appointed in solido, by Gen Mower. It elected by a vote of 7, a negro Lieutenant of police.

Mr. — offered a resolution that all persons who have been or who shall hereafter be elected or nominated to office within the limits of the Board of Aldermen, be required to take the test oath, and exhibit their registration papers, was carried unanimously.

It would be well to ascertain who the Mr. blank is, who makes motions which excludes nearly every Southern citizen from all the offices of the Corporation. The gentleman who nominated the negro Lieutenant, is Mr. F. J. Leche, who we understand keeps a warehouse. All negro Elevators should be accorded that pre-eminence in the history of the times which they evidently covet.

Judge Cazabaz, who has been heretofore one of the most decided Republican and Radical Judges in the State, has resigned his place on the bench in consequence of the interference by the military commander with proceedings in his court, and thereby has evinced a high and rare degree of manliness and dignity. Judge Cazabaz was regarded by the bar and the community as an impartial and able Judge.

This style of opposition to arbitrary power is, however, futile, and does but surrender the interests of the South, into the hands of men who are the mere tools of Radical fanaticism. Had the School Board pursued, this course; the education of the white children in the city would have been under the control of Negro Aldermen. Judges, Attorneys, Directors, should resist all acts of official violence by an appeal to law, and by standing up firmly in their places, and step by step contend for what right may still remain to us. Unreasonable men are neither appeased nor quelled by an appeal to their magnanimity. They give no credit to the modesty which prefers to suffer a wrong, rather than maintain the right. And on the other hand it requires more stern virtue to oppose Satan, than the most of men have.

POLITICAL USE OF THE SOUTH.

Now that the charm of voting for Convention has been gone through with, and the elections may be counted on as a certain result, the Radical papers are announcing the strength they have in the South. Here they will march the negro in gangs to the ballot box, and fasten upon New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, the policy which those States may have rejected by their home-vote. By placing the voter so far off, that people in the North cannot distinguish whether he is a baboon or a negro, any law can be passed, or any candidate for the Presidency elected.

The Chicago Republican says:

While a few Northern States, who stood gallantly by the Union during the war, are now, in dread of the cry of "negro equality," faltering in their duty, the verdict of the people of Louisiana, Alabama and Virginia, indicates that we may yet have to look from Ohio and Pennsylvania to the South for true radicalism, and that South Carolina may dispute the palm with Massachusetts, and put to shame conservative Connecticut. It places, too, beyond a doubt the result of the next presidential contest, proving that at least eight out of the ten unreconstructed States—if not all—may be relied upon to give their electoral vote to the Republican candidate. The reconstruction of the rebel State governments on a loyal basis, which it now seems to be established beyond question, will be consummated before the close of the forth Congress, will add fifty-six members to the House of Representatives and twenty to the Senate. Of this number, it is safe to assume that at least three-fourths will be Republicans, thus adding to the Republican majority in each House.

THE ELECTIONS.

On last Tuesday the people of New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Maryland, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Kansas, voted for various State officers. The local questions were swallowed up in the higher one of, who shall control the fortunes of this government—the Radical, or the Democrat. The result indicates a continued and increasing reaction against Radicalism. Negro suffrage was rejected promptly wherever put to the vote and it is evident that the public mind of the North, is not yet sufficiently educated up to the point of admitting their fellow man (negro) to a share in the sublime business of government.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 4.—The President has issued an order to Gen. Grant, setting forth that he is reliably advised that there are within the District of Columbia a number of armed organizations, formed without authority of law, and for purposes which have not been communicated to the Government. Acting at the present time unbecomingly for the preservation of order or protection of civil authority, they have excited serious apprehensions as to their real design. You are therefore take official steps promptly disbanding and suppressing all such illegal organizations.

This order is suggested by editorial in the Chronicle stating that there are nearly two entire regiments of colored militia in the District, which may be used in certain contingency, and also based on communications from the Southern companies drilling to support Congress in the deposition of the President.

FLORENCE, Nov. 5.—The English Ambassador asks the King to Garibaldi leniently. No collision have occurred between the Italian and French. It is quiet. It is rumored that Garibaldi has become insane.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6.—The following is an approximation to the result of yesterday's elections: New York, majority 30,000. Brackets a Democratic Mayor. A future Republican by a great decided majority, with a possibility that the Democrats will have a lower House. Bailey, Republican succeeds Conklin in Congress. Maryland—every office filled by Democrat. New Jersey—Democratic majority 6000. Eight major on joint ballot of Legislature, Massachusetts—same as at noon.

WISCONSIN.—The Legislature is Republican, which secures Senator, vice Doolittle. There is much deploring by the Democrats throughout the country. Fairchild, Republican, elected, though Democrats gained 5000 in the State on joint ballot.

MINNESOTA.—Marshall, Republican is elected. Negro suffrage is defeated by a decided majority.

KANSAS.—Both negro and for suffrage have been defeated.

A closer contest especially Wisconsin and Minnesota change affairs.

All the Tammany candidates elected in the city of New York. Postmaster General Randall received a dispatch this afternoon stating that Wisconsin is still doubtful.

Later dispatches render a majority on joint ballot of New Legislature almost certain. It will give Seymour the Senate. James B. McGormick, Democrat succeeds Neill to the House of Missouri.

New York, Nov. 6.—The Legislature is Democratic on joint ballot with a probable majority in the Senate.

The New Jersey Legislature Democratic in both branches.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6.—In Kansas both negro and female suffrage defeated by eight to ten thousand.

Latest accounts from Wisconsin indicate Fairchild's election by reduced majority, but a decided Republican Legislature.

In Minnesota negro suffrage defeated, and William Marshall probably elected Governor by small majority.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6.—The New York Tribune estimates the Legislature as follows: Senate, 18 Republicans to 14 Democrats; Assembly, 71 Republicans to 51 Democrats.

It acknowledges that the result are meagre, but says there is no doubt but that there will be a Republican majority.

Boston, Nov. 6.—John Quincy Adams, though not elected Governor, is elected representative. The Legislature is overwhelmingly for license.

PANAMA, Nov. 6.—The Emperor Austria has departed homeward. Florence, Nov. 6.—The Garibaldians lost 450 killed and 900 prisoners in the recent battles—wounded not counted. Papal loss 200 killed and wounded.

Nov. 6—Evening.—One of the French troops have left for Givita Vecchia, and the remainder will soon follow. They will then await the action of Italy. The Bourse was animated, but the alarming news of the necessity of a general conference soon to be issued by France.

Nov. 6—Evening.—Garibaldi claims he is an American. Mr. Moreh, the American minister, has gone to visit him. Garibaldi commands the Italian Army of Observation on the frontier, with headquarters at Trivoli.

Nov. 6—Evening.—The prisoners on trial have been acquitted.

Nov. 6—A cable dispatch dated near Corcora, Sunday, Garibaldi, with his forces, concentrated around Monte Rotondo, waited upon by a deputation, urged to withdraw. Garibaldi stated that he did not value his life, a soldier should not count his number.

The deputation replied that a general should count the enemy and draw. Garibaldi with 3000 men and two moved toward Trivoli, which was the scene of the disaster at Trivoli. Garibaldi, while marching, patriotic songs, were supplied by seven Papal battalions, seven guns, who attacked both and both flanks. Garibaldi, dragged away by his retreating men. The Garibaldians made a hours fight at Monte Rotondo, after losing 900 killed and captured. Menotti Garibaldi hurt in the leg.

NO LONGER EPIDEMIC.

THE BOARD OF HEALTH—THE YELLOW FEVER NO LONGER EPIDEMIC.

The Board of Health.—The Commission on Health-beg leave to report on the city of New Orleans. The report is free from all epidemic diseases, and your committee return at once without apologetic return from the scourge that prevailed so extensively in our city. It is impossible for your committee to tell the number of cases of yellow fever that have been treated, unless physicians will give the number of cases treated, and those who have died.

The committee recommend that the Secretary of the Board of Health publish alphabetically the names of the physicians treating them, and, if possible, all the cases treated by said physicians and cured. This will give to the public statistics that will be very valuable in future, and enable this Board to show to the world that yellow fever is a disease that can be cured with proper treatment. The disease generally has been of a mild type. It is true that there have been some violent cases, and where complicated with other diseases, have proved fatal; but generally speaking, the disease has yielded to treatment. The total number of deaths since the 8th June, up to this day, have been 5710. Of this number 3006 have been of yellow fever, 139 of cholera, and other diseases 2865.

Your committee cannot close this report without mentioning favorably the Howard Association. The gentlemen composing this association have placed not only the citizens of New Orleans under lasting obligations to them, but the people of every clime should love and cherish the name of a Howard. At all hours of the day and night, when sorrow was in almost every household, you could see the Howards giving aid and relief in all directions.

The success of the Howards has been wonderful, and your committee feel assured that this has been owing greatly to the selection of competent physicians, who have been educated in the medical schools of New Orleans. Too much praise cannot be given to those young men who have given their time and strength to the care of the sick and dying. Your committee would like to mention names, but it would be invidious. All have done their duty nobly. Your committee would recommend that the daily mortuary reports be discontinued from and after Sunday 10th inst., and the sextons be requested to make weekly returns after that period.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the motion offered by Dr. Warren Stone at the last meeting of this Board. Respectfully submitted, W. G. Austin, Chairman Committee on Health. The above report was adopted.

MARRIED.

In the Methodist Church, Waukegan, Illinois, Nov. 5, by Rev. J. H. Brown, Mr. JOHN F. RANDOLPH to Miss EMMA REBECCA PARHAM, daughter of J. G. and Mrs. Mary E. Parham, all of New Orleans.

We give our young friends great joy. Sorry we were not there; in fact can't approve altogether of marriages taking place at the North pole when both the parties belong to New Orleans; and question whether those preachers way up there can tie a knot as neatly and firmly as those do of our own latitude.

On the 22nd of October, 1867, by Rev. Charles B. Stuart, John L. Scales, Esq., to Miss MARGARET S. MENDY, daughter of the late Capt. J. W. Mendy, all of Mansfield, La.

OBITUARIES.

Departed this life, September 19, 1867, in the town of Columbia, Miss., Doctor A. J. BLACKBURN, a local deacon of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Bro. Blackburn was born in East Feliciana Parish, October 11, 1801. He was the son of one of the first settlers in that part of the state; and his father before him was a prominent and useful local preacher in the church.

The doctor having embraced religion at a very early age, commenced preaching when 19 years old, and the practice of medicine at 23; and thro' life maintained an unspotted reputation as a minister and physician, administering alike to the souls and bodies of men, with such faithfulness, zeal and kindness, as won for him an enviable position and a consecrated remembrance in the hearts and minds of those who knew him.

In 1866, he took work in the Mississippi Conference, and was appointed to Covington, La., where his gentlemanly bearing, polished urbanity and deep piety endeared him to all his flock. Tho' possessed of considerable preaching abilities, he had to mourn to see so little fruit of his toils; and tho' like the prophet, he had to exclaim, "Lord who hath believed our report;" yet his record was on high, for he was one of those who "sighed and cried for the abominations of the people."

At the close of the year, his health began to fail, and feeling his work nearly finished, he returned to Washington Parish, La.; but here he was not idle. By day and by night, as long as he was able, he attended the sick, and filled an appointment monthly, on a circuit left without a preacher, till being called to attend the Columbia Court, he was taken sick on the way, was conveyed to the town where he had long resided. In his brief illness, he exclaimed, in relation to eternity, "all is bright." These requests to be carried to the gallery, took a last look at his old home; gave his parting blessing to his son of many prayers, and calmly and resignedly breathed his soul into the bosom of his God. "The righteous are taken from the evil to come."

G. T. VICKERS.

Died, at his residence, in Yazoo County, Miss., on the 4th day of October, inst., BURWELL SCOTT, in the 75th year of his age.

It is often the case, when our friends are removed from among us, by death, that we magnify their virtues and forget their faults. In this instance, however, we are in no danger of falling into such an error; for even the tongue of envy, that spares so few, has never breathed aught against the character of him, who is the subject of this notice; and those who knew him, so esteemed and venerated him, that they will consider nothing exaggerated, when written in his praise.

It is rarely the good fortune of any community to enjoy for so long a time the beneficent influence of the wise counsel and noble example of so good a man; and whilst we mourn this loss, and that of the patriotic citizen, the kind neighbor, the disinterested friend and devoted christian. We endeavor to console ourselves by the reflection, that he closed a long life of usefulness, in which he illustrated every political, social and christian virtue, by that greatest of all human triumphs, a christian death. In 1818, Burwell Scott became a member of the Methodist church. For forty-eight years he fought "the good fight and kept the faith." In adversity, in prosperity, in sickness and in health, in joy and in sorrow, through evil report as well as good report, he preserved his consistency as a christian, and "let his light so shine" among men, that many were induced to seek religion, because so good a man professed its truths and obeyed its precepts. So highly indeed, was he esteemed by his neighbors, that his honesty and christianity passed into a proverb, and in the vicinity, where he lived, to say of a man, that "he was almost as honest as Burwell Scott," or of a member of the church, "that he was almost as good a christian, as Burwell Scott," was the acme of praise. To him religion had a constant defender, for his life, in its every act, was an illustration of the truths of the gospel, and a conclusive argument in favor of their beneficial effect upon man's character which no sophist could equal. Not even a stranger could hear him pray without feeling that he was in the presence of a sincere christian. His charity was only limited by his means and was no less effective because unostentatious. His public spirit did not diminish, as age came on, but he was ever ready, with his advice and his means, to aid any object of public interest, which he considered worthy. But he is gone from among us! No more shall we have the benefit of his wise counsel and noble example! No more shall we hear his loved voice, which so often gladdened the well, cheered the sick, and comforted the dying. No more, on earth, shall we behold that countenance from which beamed truth and honesty!

The church, the community, neighbors, friends and a devoted wife, all mourn his loss as irreparable. But we sorrow not without hope, for we know that he spent his life in preparing for death, and when it came at last, it found him with his lamp trimmed and burning, ready to go through the dark valley, to that beautiful land beyond. We sorrow not without hope, for only a few days before his death, when he felt his end approaching, he said to a minister, "I die in the faith, I feel no fear regarding the future." We sorrow not without hope, for we know that our loss is his eternal gain, and that, whilst earth has one good man less, another saint has been added to the heavenly host that surround the Eternal Throne and hymn the praises of the Most High.

Yazoo County, Oct. 18, 1867.

Died, in Baton Rouge, La., October 20th, 1867, LIZZIE, only daughter of W. H. N. and Mary Magruder, aged 14 years and two months.

In June last, Lizzie connected herself with the church; sometime after professed to her Pastor in class meeting, that God had pardoned her sins and now is gone to glory. "Mild and lovely, and gentle as the summer breeze," she has passed away, leaving the memory full of sweet remembrances of her spiritless purity.

"Dearest Lizzie, thou hast left us, Here thy loss we deeply feel, But 'tis God who hath bereft us, He can all our sorrow heal."

"Yet again we hope to meet thee, When the day of life is fled, Then, in Heaven, with joy to greet thee, Where no farewell tear is shed."

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

From the Child at Home.
AS SIMPLE AS A LITTLE CHILD.

As simple as a little child,
So Jesus taught his own to be:
Would, Lord, that in our almost faith, We were like such and thee!

The baby, tottering at my knee, Looks up undebating when I speak, And clasps my finger trustfully, So consoling he is weak.

Did him lay the mischief down, And show a toy and promise this:
He ran, but ere he takes the prize, Offers the new ring kiss.

So when, for England's thirly soil,
The anxious husbandmen would pray,
And gathered to their place of prayer, As on a Sabbath-day,

A little maiden, who had deemed To ask a grace were certain gain, A large umbrella brought to church, Because they prayed for rain.

The pastor smiled; not his the faith That saw the good brought about at hand: No cloud betokened in the sky A blessing in the land.

Dear simple child! 'Tis sweet to know Such faith as he is not in vain:
Even while they pray, the wind rose high,
With lightning and with rain.

O Jesus! teach our hearts to know In simple trust as pure as hers, First what to ask, and then to grasp A faith that never errs.

Them that Honor Me, I will Honor.

"That is right, my boy," said the merchant, smiling approvingly upon the bright face of his little shop-boy. He had brought him a dollar that lay among the dust and paper of the sweepings.

"That's right," he said again, "always be honest, it is the best policy."

"Should you say that?" asked the lad timidly.

"Should I say what? that honesty is the best policy? Why it's a time-honored old say—I don't know about the elevating tendency of the thing—the spirit is rather narrow I'll allow."

"So grand-mother taught me," replied the boy; she said we must do right because God approved it, without thinking what man would say."

The merchant turned abruptly towards the desk, and the thoughtless little lad resumed his duties.

In the course of the morning, a rich and influential citizen called at the store. While conversing, he said, "I have no children of my own, and I fear to adopt one. My experience is that a boy of twelve, (the age that I should prefer) is fixed in his habits, and if bad—

"Stop!" said the merchant, "do you see that lad yonder?"

"With that noble brow?—yes, what of him?"

"He is remarkable—"

"Yes, yes—that's what everybody tells me that has a boy to dispose of—no doubt he'll do well enough before your face. I've tried a good many, and have been deceived more than once."

"I was going to say," replied the merchant calmly, "that he is remarkable for principle. Never have I known him to deviate from the right, sir—never. He would restore a pin—indeed (the merchant colored) he's a little too honest for my employ. He points out flaws in goods, and I cannot teach him prudence in that respect—common prudence, you know, is—common—common prudence—ahem?"

The stranger made no assent and the merchant hurried on to say—

"He was a parish orphan, taken by an old woman out of pity, when yet a babe. Poverty has been his lot; no doubt he has suffered from hunger and cold uncounted times; his hands have been frozen, so have his feet. Sir, that boy would have died rather than be dishonest. I can't account for it; upon my word I don't."

"Have you any claims upon him?"

"Not the least in the world, except what common benevolence offers. Indeed the boy is entirely too good for me."

"Then I'll adopt him; and if I have found one really honest boy, I'll thank God."

The little fellow rode home in a carriage, and was ushered into a luxurious home; and he who had sat shivering in a cold corner, listening to the words of a poor old pious creature, who had been taught of the Spirit, became one of the best and greatest divines that England ever produced.

"Them that honor Me, I will honor."

From the Little Corporal.

HOW FRED GOT HIS LEARNING.

If you want anything, you must get it. That is the way Fred did. Some boys don't ever expect to have anything, unless it comes floating up the tide and washes ashore just at their feet. Such boys as these are as round and soft as a toadstool. Why don't you harness up your ideas, if you have any, and drive ahead?

Fred was a poor boy. He was born and brought up among the rocks and hills of New England. The rocks there are very plenty, as all New England boys know very well. But I don't think there is any gold in them, as there is in the rocks of California. Fred never found any there. But those is something better than gold—that is, work. Fred soon saw how the thing went. He saw men digging the rocks out of their fields to let the corn grow. Once, he saw a great mountain of rock, all alive with men, and hammers. They were splitting out great square stones, and columns, and shafts. The men all worked, and drilled, and sweat; and every chip was off with a song. Fred saw that this was the way to do it. Work and sing—sing and work. Pillars and columns, grand and beautiful, came forth from the mountain sides, and were carried away to distant cities.

"That is the way," said Fred; every thing is made by work. I can work as well as the rest of them. I will see what work will do."

So Fred went to work to make a man of himself. Here are the rules that he laid down; 1. Work first and then play. 2. Make the most of things. 3. What I do, do well. 4. Remember that God sees me.

This was the flag that Fred marched under. He was poor. He had no rich father to smooth his way, and to help him along over the rough places. But he made a man of himself, for all that.

So I say to you, soldiers of the Corporal's Army, work! If you are all like Fred, none of you ever need to say "fail." The God of heaven will always help those who help themselves.

(Translated for Every Saturday from the Revue des Deux Mondes.)

THE VELOCITY OF THE WILL.

When people say as quick as thought, they readily believe that they have just expressed the ne plus ultra of velocity, a velocity to which nothing approaches, something instantaneous and electrical. They believe, in a word, they have made use of a hyperbole: it is a mistake, at least in a certain sense. Thought, it is true, transports us to a distance without taking count of the intermediate space, because it is not any more difficult to represent to one's self distant objects than near ones; from this point of view it is lawful for us to say that space does not constitute an obstacle for thought, that it does not shackle it, that it inconveniences it in no wise; but thought is not instantaneously born under the influence of an external cause; there elapses an appreciable time, —one or two tenths of a second,—before an idea awakes in the mind in consequence of an impression received by the brain, and that the will answers this idea by the movement of a limb. Likewise, the nervous current which transmits sensations to the brain and the orders of the will to the extremities of the body, requires a certain time to perform its journey. The impressions which come to us from outside are not perceived at the same moment they are produced; they travel along the nerves with a velocity of 20 to 40 metres a second, which is that of the carrier-pigeon, that of a hurricane and that of a locomotive going at full speed, but which is very inferior to the velocity of a cannon-ball. It is, for example, only at the end of the half-tenth of a second that we receive the consciousness of an injury done to one of our feet. The messages of the will go with the same slowness from the centre to the periphery; the limbs do not obey at once the motive idea. When motion is caused by a shock received at any one point of the body, the excitation first propagates itself to the brain; there an idea is elaborated, the will decides upon sending an order, this order runs along the nerves to the limb which is to act and this last at length enters into motion. All this takes place in three different times, the duration of which is very appreciable.

In the human body, this time lost is of very little account: some hundredths of a second; but let us take one of the cetaceous tribe, the whale for instance, in which the telegraphic network of the will commands a larger empire. A boat attacks it in the rear; the harpoon strikes the monster in the tail. Pain then begins to march in order to solicit reprisals; but the way is a long one, it has to travel thirty metres before it arrives at the head-quarters of the will. Here is a second lost.—What next takes place? What time is required for reflection? That depends upon circumstances; but it is certain that the will has need, in order to come to a decision, of a measurable time. Then it acts: the order to upset the boat is despatched to the tail. Another second passes before this message arrives at its destination: total, two seconds during which the boat and the sailors have been able to get out of the way by vigorous pulling.

How, will people ask us, have savans been able to measure this velocity of propagation of the nervous excitement? Several methods have been thought of in order to do so. A doctor of the Middle Ages, mentioned by Haller, had already thought of this problem. He assumed—strange conception!—that the velocity of the nervous fluid could be deduced from that of the blood in the aorta; according to him, the velocities must be in the inverse relation of the widths of the aorta and the nervous tubes. This calculation gave, for the velocity of the nervous fluid, about two hundred millions of kilometres: six hundred times the velocity with which light moves.

Haller set about it differently.—Reading the Æneid aloud, he counted the number of letters he could pronounce, while reading very fast, in the space of a minute. He found fifteen hundred to be the extreme limit: the 1500th part of a minute for each letter. Now the letter r requires, according to Haller, ten successive contractions of the muscle which makes the tongue vibrate, and from that we may conclude, he says, that in a minute this muscle can contract and relax fifteen thousand times, which represents thirty thousand simple movements. From the brain to the muscle which is here in question, the distance is 1 decimetre. If the nervous agent travels it thirty thousand times, that makes 3 kilometres, and 3 kilometres a minute represent, a velocity of 50 metres a second.—This reasoning is only a series of errors; we may wonder so much the more at the approximation with which Haller has obtained a datum which his process was not calculated to discover. The Æneid, which formerly passed for a book of oracles, has this time justified its reputation.

It was only in 1850 that these investigations have been resumed in a different way which was to lead to the solution of the problem. We owe it to M. Helmholtz, the most celebrated of the German physiologists, to a rare talent for observation the profound knowledge of a consummate mathematician. His first method is based on the use of the chronoscope of M. Pouillet. A galvanic current of very short duration acts at a distance upon a magnetized needle, it moves it from its primitive position; the greatness of the deviation is measured, and by calculation the duration of the current is deduced from it. Thus the means is obtained of measuring intervals of time which do not exceed some thousandth part of a second. This is how M. Helmholtz has applied this method. One of the muscles of the leg of a frog is fixed by one extremity in a pincers and attached by the other extremity to a little lever which makes part of a galvanic circle. A weight suspended to this lever serves to give to the muscle the proper tension. All is arranged in such a manner that at the moment when the current is stopped a shock is given, either directly in the muscle, or at a given point of a nerve which has been isolated at a length of 4 to 5 centimetres, and which still adheres by an end to the muscle which it is intended to animate. Under the influence of this excitation, the muscle contracts, makes the lever move, and interrupts the electric current which was crossing this last. The time during which the current has circulated is indicated by the magnetic needle. It is found then that the contraction occurs later when the nerve has been excited than when the muscle has been directly excited; the difference allows us to know the velocity of transmission of the nervous agent; it has been found equal to 26 metres the second. M. Helmholtz has demonstrated besides that, in every case, the contraction does not follow the elective shock until after a period of time which is equal to a one hundredth of a second, which he calls the time of latent excitation. The muscular fibres, then, do not obey instantaneously the shock of electricity. This is why the waters of the sea do not rise under the influence of the attraction which the moon exercises upon them until this planet is already far from the meridian.

FARM AND GARDEN.

PROPAGATION BY CUTTINGS.—The best way to propagate all the common kinds of bedding plants is to take a frame or hand glass and set it on a bed of very sandy soil, made in a shady place in the open air. The sand should be fine and sharp, and there is, perhaps, nothing better than river sand for this purpose. The glass may be whitewashed on the inside, so as to afford additional security against injury from the sun's rays. Into this bed of sand, cuttings of half-ripened wood of the desirable plants may be set, and after putting in, slightly watered. Even very rare plants often do better this way than when under treatment in a regular propagating house. In making cuttings, it is best to cut the shoots just under a bud—they root better, and are not so likely to rot off and decay. A cutting of about three eyes is long enough for most strong-growing things, such as geraniums, fuchsias, etc.

Small growing things, of course, will take more buds to the one cutting. From one to three inches is, however, long enough for most cuttings. They should be inserted about one-third of their way under the sand, which latter should be pressed firmly against the row of cuttings with a flat piece of board—not, however, hard enough to force the particles of sand into the young and tender bark, which is often the first step to decay. For a few cuttings, they may be inserted with a dibble; but where many are to be put in, it saves time to mark a line on the sand with rule or straight edge, and then cut down a face into the sand, say one or two inches deep, when the cuttings can be set against the face like box edging. All amateurs should practice the art of propagating plants. There is nothing connected with gardening more interesting.

CURING GREEN HIDES.—A great many butchers, wool dealers and others, are purchasers of the hides of the beef in the country towns, and we often get from them inquiries as to the most proper and profitable method of curing the hide and preparing it for the market. A great many butchers do not use proper care in this branch, and the consequence is that the hides will not pass city inspection, owing entirely to the ignorance and carelessness of the person who prepared them for market.

The proper way to salt hides is, to lay them out flat, flesh side up, and form a nearly square bed; say 12 by 15 feet, folding the edges so as to make them as nearly solid as possible. Split the ear in the cords that run up the ear in each one, so as to make them lie out flat. Sprinkle the hide with two or three shovelfuls of coarse salt, as the size may require—says for a 60 or 80 pound hide, from 10 to 15 pounds of salt. At any rate cover the hide well, as it need not be wasted; then let them lie in this from 15 to 20 days, after which take them up, shake the salt out and use it again for the same purpose.

DRIED FIGS.—The dry figs equal to any that are imported, and that will keep any number of years. I have kept them five years. Three qualities may be made: First, figs not quite ripe; second, those barely ripe; third, fully ripe. Put each quality to themselves.

First. Soak in weak ley. This is to take the roughness off the skin. It is, however, not essential. Second boil in good sugar syrup ten or fifteen minutes; take out and dry in plates and dishes until fully dry. Then bake or steam, to kill the fly eggs, and then pack in tight boxes, using a little powdered sugar. Seal up until wanted for use. If you use a drying furnace, there will be no fly eggs on the figs or peaches, and they will be ready as soon as dry for packing.

Very respectfully,
DAVID DICKSON.

EARLY CORN.—In accordance with an article in the January No. of the Southern Cultivator, on the advantages of cultivating a variety of early corn, so as to escape our usual summer drought, we this season planted a field of corn—seed from the North West. Three days previous, we planted the large gourd seed corn of the country, in another field. It was treated alike in all respects. The Western corn grew about five feet high—each stalk having two large ears. On the 20th of August, it was dry enough to grind for meal, while the gourd-seed variety will not be suitable for meal for a month. As we grow this crop for the grain, and not for the stalk, are not the smaller varieties better adapted to our climate?

TO MAKE CHEESE.—Warm milk till equal to new, but observe it must not be hot; now add a sufficiency of rennet to turn it, and cover it over; let it remain till well turned then strike the curd well down with the skimming-dish, and let it separate, observing to keep it still covered. Put the vat over the tub, and fill it with curd, which must be squeezed close with the hand, and more is to be added as it sinks, and at length left about three inches above the edge of the vat. Before the vat is in this manner filled, the cheese cloth must be laid at the bottom of it, and, when full, drawn smoothly over on all sides. The curd should be salted in the tub after the way is out. When everything is prepared as above directed, put a board under and over the vat, then place it in the press; let it remain two hours; then turn it out put on a fresh cheese cloth, and press it again ten hours. The vat should have several small holes in the bottom, to let the whey off.

is gone, that source of Southern wealth is numbered with the things that were. "Cannot white men who furnish their own labor and cultivate their own land, make cotton?"

Certainly it is possible, but equally certain they cannot make it profitably. What then? How are we to purchase the things we cannot produce? How are we to make our labor productive? We have already said not by cotton growing, under present circumstances. We must give up the old and grand idea of being cotton planters. Will the glory of producing one, two, or five hundred bales compensate us for selling them for less than their cost us? At any rate, it is a species of luxury, that but few can afford. A kind Providence be praised, we are not shut up to the necessity of cotton growing, to secure comfort, or even steady increase of wealth. There are other fields of enterprise, and our beneficent climate and generous soil invites with encouraging hope to other forms of productive labor. Scores of millions are annually sent out of the South, and expended for all kinds of manufactured articles, for example cotton and woolen goods, furniture, wooden ware, carriages, waggon, plows, and all kinds of machinery, with hats and shoes by the million. Cannot these things be produced among us? And cannot we thus profitably employ labor and capital? Cannot our large uncultivated plantations, together with our vast grass-forest and prairies be made most profitable in rearing mutton and wool? But the dogs? That is easily remedied, put a heavy tax on dogs, and sheep raising is a success, and wool to the extent of an indefinite number of millions of pounds can be produced; produced with white labor, and worth more than cotton. Can we not in many localities grow grapes and make real wine, with white labor, and thereby promote at once the wealth and health of the South.
I should regard the production of wine from the juice of grapes, instead of various villainous chemical compounds, as a great temperance and sanitary movement. On the lines of railways and navigable rivers, fruits and strawberries can be grown with great profit. We send millions annually to the North and West for butter and cheese, when our woods and fields are covered with grass eight months in the year.
Let us establish dairies and supply our own demands for these necessaries.

That cotton growing among us under present auspices, is no longer profitable, is not debatable, and except on thin uplands is an unhealthy crop for white laborers.

The heavy dews of August and September, with the hot sun of these months under a Southern sky, when the cotton must be gathered, is too much for Anglo-Saxon blood; fevers, and chills and fevers, so difficult to get rid of, and so wearing, are almost inevitable. Let cotton enough for home consumption be produced, and let us spin and weave it in our own cotton mills. I know that this general change of labor and enterprise, will require a little time to bring it about; but we have yet to come to it, if we would be prosperous and really independent.

Let young men especially, take this matter under advisement; let them inform themselves upon the points here suggested. We can make our great and favored section among the most prosperous, powerful and happy portions of the earth. W.

The distance from the Mediteranean to the Red Sea, to be united by the Suez canal, is about 100 miles. The canal is to be one hundred feet wide and thirty feet deep.

About 140,000 pounds of human hair are annually sold in Paris, at prices varying from $5 to $8 per pound. It is principally bought from the peasantry of France, Italy, Belgium, and Germany.

BOOKS FOR THE BLIND.

Mr. Editor:—Amid the tumultuous utterance and dazzling doing of the present, it is well to retire a while from the noise, and try to catch the undertone in which truth is distinctly but unobtrusively said; to turn from the show, and look at the work which has worth without glare. While Draper, Spencer, and their like are talking theories of evolution, declaring the law of progress and using the law unjustly, while Gailyle and his co-thinkers are hearing and interpreting the everlasting nay, and American unbelief is asserting itself in hurtful credulity, it is good to look at the humble men who obey the law of life, through fulfilling the law of love.
Men who hear the everlasting yea, of duty, feel the eternal affirmation of truth, and seek to express faith in God in work which blesses men.

At one of these men and his work it is worth while to glance.

About twelve years ago, Mr. D.
Sherrod, then a pupil of the Miss-sissippi Institution for the blind, desired an increase of the number and variety of the books for the blind. In due time this desire acquired the intensity of an inspiration, and this thought assumed the distinctiveness of a purpose, and the definite-ness of a plan. He began his work with but little background to rest on; many who wished the consummation of his design believed it unattainable, money must be raised, organizations formed, and an institution created. Alone he prosecuted his mission. He encountered sin-gularity, indifference, selfishness, and the icy sympathy which thrives only beyond the active circle of the heart. He found also good brotherly men, who gave him heart help and cash aid. He secured the organization of Boards of Trustees in several States, and obtained from the Legislatures of Mississippi and Kentucky, acts, incorporating his prospective Institution, under the name of American Printing House for the Blind. The war suspended his operations, but did not abate his enthusiasm, or kill his enterprise. The printing house is now a living working institution, located at Louisville, Ky., and fulfilling its light-giving mission. The endowment is said to be about thirty thousand dollars, and efforts are making to increase it. To do this work, require faith, patience, courage, fortitude, and self-sacrifice. If the measure of a man be spiritual force, expressed in good work, then this man may fairly take rank among the great well-doers, for this printing house is the embodiment benevolence of many a summary of philanthropy; a manifestation of the more abundant life which the Son of man came to give.
Time was, when a blind man cried to the Saviour for sight, and the seeing crowd, with cowardly emultude bade him be still. Once, men believed they did well to give the destitute blind man a crust and a coat, but now they are ready to give him a book. This marks a great advance. Truly Christ has come. This is a clear recognition of the truth "there is a spirit in man and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding." It is an assertion of felt brotherhood.
Surely the spirit of truth is guiding men into all truths as fast as they will follow.

Mr. Sherrod is also trying to establish a high school to be called "American University for the Blind." Such a school is needed, and the undertaking will be approved by all who value thought-power and heart-purity. The utility of such an Institution is too apparent to require special presentation. Men need not be told the worth of sunshine. For a long time it was believed that the bureau of social injustice possessed evidence which victed the blind of total helplessness.

Accordingly society doomed him to ignorance and declared uselessness their destiny. Blind men from Homer to Huber, from Sanpson to John Ziska, protested against this verdict, and demonstrated that the destruction of sight was not the death of manhood.
Such protest was no match for the doubtful which pronounced the verdict. This unbelief is another instance of the intellectual sin of resting on a prima assumption, instead of on a deduction from carefully made and accurately classified observations. This kind of unbelief can only be exorcised by the spirit of Christ. The Son of man only knew man, and fully taught man's worth, and men are now slowly spelling out the lessons he gave. The Christian forces around and within us, have cast out many devils. The spirit of philanthropy has entered the body social, and in this country, society has declared its belief in the duty and utility of educating the blind.

This University project asks only a special emphasis. Institutions created by a people's benevolence mean recognition of announced obligations, and the purpose to fulfill them. They effect the elevation of those whom they are intended directly to benefit, and the moral elevation of any part of society lightens the tone of the whole.

A nation's wealth is made up of more than the products of field and factory, which statisticians talu-late. It consists in purified manhood, reverence for goodness, domestic virtue, real brotherhood, and loyalty to truth. Every good work brings an actual increment to a people's spiritual possessions. So believing, I will only add my earnest wish that these enterprises may become full-grown and largely beneficent influences.

THE ILLINOIS CONFERENCE.

The First Illinois Annual Conference of the Episcopal Methodist Church met in Nashville, Ill., Oct.
16th, 1867. Bishop Doane, the chief of the opening religious services, and then made an address appropriate to the occasion.

As you left at Nashville Friday night, you will not be able to know what occurred after that day, and some things of a very interesting character transpired after you left.
A report will not be out of place Sunday was spent in closing a the winter business of the conference. Saturday night found us in the grove with a large audience of our missionary addresses. From Bishop Doane and Dr. McPherson, and to respond in a very literary contribution. The addresses were characteristic of the men, and appreciated by the people to the amount of over $500, which has since been increased to $600. This from the village of Nashville, is a testimony liberal, and speaks encouragingly for the hold our cause has upon the hearts of the people.
The appropriation made by Conference for the ensuing year is $1,500, $500 of which are now raised.

On Sabbath morning we held a love-feast, which was indeed a feast of joy, and four persons joined the Church. At 11 o'clock Bishop Doane preached in the grove to a large and delighted audience, from Acts, xix: 20. Many said it was the best sermon ever preached in this part of the country, and especially appreciated because of its non-political character. Five persons were ordained deacons and several joined the Church. At 3 o'clock Bro. Sherrod, formerly of Missouri, preached a good sermon, and one person was admitted elder. Preaching also at night by Bro. V. Smithson, when a glorious revival broke out. Nine penitents came to the altar, several of whom professed religion and fifteen joined the Church, making twenty-seven additions to the M. E.
Church during the session of the Conference.

Here are the statistics of the M.
E. Church, as reported to the Conference. It is proper to say, however, that the reports were only approximate and not definite.

Numbers of preachers, 40; church members, 2,500; church houses, 10, valued at $10,000; admitted on trial, 7; local preachers, 16; Sunday schools, 27; scholars, 1,080.

The preachers are in fine spirits, impatient to get to their fields of labor, and all full of hope as to the future. And the people are said to be hungry for the bread of life, and knew not where to look for it, except to the M. E. Church. They have asked elsewhere for bread, and have received a stone, and scorpions have been given when fish were expected. What shall be done for this people? They are ready to go with the M. E. Church, presided over by our Bishops, and with us also, as a pure, non-political Church, minus the name. They expect to be with us yet, and I hope the time is not far distant when the useless appendage to our name, which now cripples our operations North, and keeps us out in the South, will no longer clog the wheels of our work.

HOLSTON CONFERENCE

In our last issue we gave some account of this Conference, which began its session at Cleveland, Oct.
25. From the minutes forwarded us by the courteous Secretaries, Brothers Brunner and Payne, we learn that the session closed Oct.
29. Nine preachers were admitted on trial; seven remain on trial; two were admitted into full connection; five were re-admitted; four were received by transfer; two local preachers, W. W. Lillard and M. L. Glendendon, were ordained deacons; three traveling preachers —H. M. Bennett, J. L. M. French, Jr., T. F. Smyth—and two local preachers—A. Q. Harmon, J. A. Dyer—were ordained elders; one had died —the excellent Thomas K. Catlett.
There were 194 local preachers; 25,158 white, 435 colored, 75 Indian members. There are 815 infant and 1,501 adult baptisms reported —the returns being very imperfect, some ministers not reporting at all —235 Sunday schools, 1,603 teachers, 9,441 scholars. The annual offering for superannuated preachers, widows and orphans, was $1-500—deficiencies of preachers, $10, 781 31: Conference collection, $282 02; missionary, $1,143 36. Such reports on Education, Books and Periodicals, etc., as the Secretary may see fit to publish, will be spread upon our columns, as soon as we receive them. We do not pray that the great Master may accompany his servants to their respective fields of labor in this interesting and important Conference and crown all their labors with success.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
Marion Circuit—Mobile Conference.

Mr. Editor:—I have been gratified and greatly encouraged in reading the revival notices published in your, and may I not say our excellent paper, not only in the bounds of this, but also in other Conferences; and it may be equally heart-cheering to others, to learn that God has been greatly reviving his work on this circuit, on which there are ten appointments. On this work I have just closed the ninth protracted meeting, each of which was held from four days to two weeks, and some of them were attended with a Divine power, such as characterized Methodism in its early history. At some of these meetings, I was greatly assisted by the local preachers of this circuit, some of whom are truly working men. Bro. John Hayes of the Miss. Conference also assisted me at two of my meetings; at others, I scarcely had any assistance in the pulpit or altar, but thank God, I was at all the meetings assisted by the Holy Spirit. The seed sown was watered from on high, it took deep root, sprang up, and produced an abundant crop.

Besides the building up, and animating the old Church members, who had been discouraged and rendered poor by the Sherman raid in 1864, and further disheartened and impoverished by failure in crops for two years, and at the same time, equally poor in the graces of the spirit, there has been since the commencement of this series of protracted meetings, about one hundred and seventy-five conversions, and one hundred and fifty-four additions to the Church. O that the work may continue to spread, until every knee shall bow to the name of Jesus, and every tongue confess!

W. SPILLMAN.
Marion Station, Miss., Nov. 1st, 1867.

Arbucote Circuit—Mont. Conference.

Mr. Editor:—It may not be uninteresting to the readers of the Advocate, to hear from this portion of the Lord's vineyard, especially as we have been favored with the missionary operations of the so-called "Mother-Church," who did us some injury in point of numbers, but none in genuine goodness. Those who left us were of little force to the Church, and this progress is effectually checked in this circuit, and the terrible storm which threatened the destruction of the Church in these parts has passed over, and is followed by the gentle showers of Divine grace. We have had a glorious revival throughout the entire country, with the exception of three or four appointments. We had two camp-meetings, at each 26 accessions to the Church, and a number of conversions. The Church was greatly spiritualized, with a great many reclamations. One remarkable fact connected with the revival is, that very nearly all that have joined the Church were the hardest cases in the circuit. The "Lord be praised." May the work continue to spread until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our God! Respectfully,

J. O. A. BRIDGES.

Pinckneyville Circuit—Montgomery Conference.

Mr. Editor:—I am now closing up my work on this circuit, it being the end of the 3d. year that I have labored on this work, many precious seasons have we had since I have been laboring on this circuit. We have had a general revival throughout the entire work the past year. Assisted by a faithful band of local preachers, and my much esteemed supernumerary brother (Dr. Thos. G. Slaughter), I have been enabled to hold protracted meetings at nearly every appointment on the work. Also we held two camp-meetings on this circuit. The net increase, or additions on the work the past year, is 165, besides many cold hearted professors have been enabled, to take higher ground in Christianity. Thanks be to God for so many displays of his power in our midst the past year. We have had seven Sabbath-schools in progress the past year, all very prosperous; the "little folk" have not been neglected on the Pinckneyville Circuit. I will be enabled to bring up an unusually large missionary and Conference collection from this circuit.

LARGUS R. BELL, Pastor, and P. E. Youngville, P. O. Ala., Nov. 4th, 1867.

Yazoo Circuit—Miss. Conference.

Mr. Editor: During the passed year we have had some good meeting on this circuit. About eighty-six have been added to the church, and many have been converted. We now have four Sabbath schools in operation. The church is in a very good state. I must say something about our revival at Midway, embracing the second Sabbath in September. My predecessors on this circuit will remember Midway as a cold hard place:—a fine church, and a nice community; but a small congregation and only eighteen members. We were assisted in the meeting by father James, a superannuated preacher of our Conference, and Bro. Wade of the Mount Olivet circuit. Eighteen were added to the church, and they of the best families in the neighborhood. Some of the most influential men in the community were converted and joined the church. This will doubtless be surprising to those who have known the past history of Midway. They now meet every Sabbath for prayer-meeting and Sunday-school, and have large congregations and good meetings.

LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE.

We extract some items from a report of its proceedings published in the St. Louis Christian Advocate.

FIFTH DAY.

FRANKLIN, KY., Oct. 7.

OPENING SERVICE.

The opening service was conducted by Dr. Summers, Bishop Pierce presiding.

VISITORS.

Rev. B. M. Messick, Prof. Stark, Dr. Prettyman and Dr. Scales were introduced.

STEWARDS' REPORT.

The Board of Stewards made a report which was adopted. It shows that the amount paid for ministerial support by the churches was thirty-four thousand six hundred and sixty-three dollars and five cents; for the bishops, fourteen hundred dollars; for widows and orphans and superannuated preachers, twelve hundred and fifty dollars.

NEXT CONFERENCE AT LOUISVILLE.

Without opposition, and by a unanimous vote Louisville was selected as the seat of the next Conference session.

BISHOP PIERCE'S ORATORY—AN ENRAPTURED YOUTH.

The Baptist and the Methodist Churches and Court House were occupied on the Sabbath by worshipping assemblies. Great crowds thronged the places of worship. Much might be said in praise of the officiating preachers, but we forbear. Bishop Pierce, who was the center of attraction, at 11 o'clock, is said to have sustained his high character as a pulpit orator.

Dr. McFerrin is responsible for the following, at the expense of the Bishop's eloquence: A young man from a rural district, half bewildered by the Bishop's oratory, said to the Doctor: "If they'll only put that preacher here to stay, I'll give ten dollars to help support him."

EDUCATIONAL REPORT.

The Committee Education made a report which was adopted. One feature of the report provides for a scheme for raising of three hundred thousand dollars for educational purposes. It is not expected to raise this large sum immediately by large contributions, but in the course of ten years, by inducing the general co-operation of the Church and its friends, obtaining a small contribution annually from each one—an amount that no one will feel, but whose aggregate will, in time, make the large sum named above.

AN ENDOWMENT FUND

AN AGENT SOLICITED.

The Bishop was requested to appoint an agent, whose duty it shall be to traverse the Conference and labor to carry out the object contemplated in the endowment scheme.

SIXTH DAY.

BASCOM MONUMENT.

The Committee on the Bascom Monument reported favorably, and solicited the co-operation of Tenn., and Memphis Conferences. Bishop Pierce, J. H. Linn and Wm. Kendrick spoke in favor of it. The report was adopted, and J. H. Linn, J. S. Lithgow and Wm. Kendrick were appointed the committee on the part of the Conference to co-operate with other committees to secure the object contemplated.

Bishop Pierce was requested to write the epitaph for the monument.

M'KENDREE MONUMENTAL CHURCH.

After some suggestive remarks by Dr. Green, a resolution was adopted requesting the co-operation of the Tennessee and Memphis Conferences in the erection of a monumental church over the remains of Bishop McKendree, at Fountain Head, in Tennessee. J. S. Lithgow proposed to be one of one hundred to raise ten thousand dollars for that purpose.

MEMORIAL SERVICE.

Six preachers have died the past year. This morning a memorial service was held in reference to them. R. Deering and G. R. Browder read the memoirs. After each memoir, two brethren made remarks in reference to the deceased, which were heard with solemn and tearful interest.

CLOSING EXERCISES.

After an appropriate address by the Bishop a hymn was sung, a prayer was offered by Dr. Linn, and the appointments announced, which were published last week. The doxology was sung, benediction was pronounced and in half an hour eighty or one hundred persons were on the cars homeward bound.

LAY DELEGATES.

Our Conferences have heretofore been largely attended by laymen, as mere lookers on. This year there were very many such present, and not a few of the gentler sex; but an additional feature of this Conference was the lay delegation, just incorporated. Four laymen were elected from each presiding elder's district, nearly all of whom were present. Among them were some of the most influential men of the various communities in which they reside—men of various vocations in life. The preachers are well pleased with the addition of this new element, and we trust that the laymen are none the less pleased.

Returning to this city, one lay delegate said he felt like he was just returning from a camp meeting. Another said he had not spent so pleasant a week in ten years.

FRANKLIN.

is a nice and flourishing town, and entertained the Conference and numerous visitors in a manner highly creditable to the hospitality of its citizens.

From the Spectator.

KING THEODORE OF ABYSSINIA.

The character and the career of this remarkable potentate, are equally strange. He unites in himself the most opposite and conflicting qualities, and his public conduct is a series of the most glaring inconsistencies. The strange combination of religious zeal and sanguinary passion, of military genius and childish pride, of political wisdom and mental obliquity, his character has as many sides as the Koh-i-Noor. Sometimes he appears before us as a sort of Eastern Charlemagne, restoring by his military genius and singular moral power the ancient Empire of Ethiopia. Then we get a glimpse of him as the stern destroyer of the feudal system, and the wise reformer of the social economy of his country. At another time we see him in the character of a Christian Mahomet, spiced with a dash of Joe Smith, believing himself specially sent by God to spread Christianity at the point of the sword; and particularly to drive the Turk out of Jerusalem. Then, again, we see him acting as the ruthless devastator of the country which he had so greatly improved, and giving his soldiers orders to "eat up" those very provinces over which he had before cast his most efficient protection. Unfortunately for us, we also know him in the character of a treacherous and spiteful savage, revenging fancied slights upon innocent and helpless persons. It is only a glimpse that we get of each character, but that is sufficient to show us that King Theodore is an interesting psychological curiosity. The basis of the character is evidently great force. His career shows conclusively that he has in a rare degree the power of commanding men. On that basis the strange medley of conflicting passions and mental qualities that make up his character contend for the mastery, and come to the surface by turns.

Prior to the year 1850, or thereabouts, the individual who was to become King Theodore had not been heard of beyond his immediate personal circle. At that time Abyssinia was divided into four or five principalities, which were practically independent of each other. Ras Ali, who governed at Debra Tabor or Gondar in the name of the titular Emperor, did indeed claim dominion over the whole country but the chiefs of Tigre and Godjam and Shoa knew how to keep their own against him very well. Therefore Ras Ali, nominally the Grand Vizier of the Emperor, but really the absolute monarch of the country, ruled only over central Abyssinia, while the outlying provinces were governed by independent chiefs. Now, Ras Ali had in his service a young man of very humble birth, named Dedjazt Kassai, whom he sent to govern certain provinces near Sennaar, under the immediate supervision of the Queen his mother. Kassai had from his earliest youth been impressed with the belief that he was destined by God to fill a high position and to do wonderful things. Like a prudent young man, he kept his tongue still however, and waited his opportunity. Sent to Sennaar, he provided himself with a following, revolted against the authority of the Queen, and managed to defeat all the forces which she successively sent against him.

All this while he professed to be the faithful subject of Ras Ali. It was only against the Queen's interference that he had rebelled; but at the same time he declined to lay down his arms, and affected to treat with the Ras. The latter sent a great army against him, but before the two forces came into collision the Ras gave an amnesty, and Kassai surrendered, and went to Debra Tabor. There his wily tongue succeeded in convincing Ras Ali that he was his good friend and servant, and that the Queen was an objectionable old lady; so he was allowed to put himself again at the head of his troops, and make war upon the Arabs. His enemies, among whom we may be sure the Queen was foremost, frequently told the Ras that the young officer had rebelled but Kassai had means of penetrating their intrigues, and generally disconcerted them by appearing in the royal camp just as he was said to have placed himself at the head of a rebellious army. His time had not yet come; so he amused himself by winning the confidence of his deluded master.

At length the time for his grand coup arrived. It was the end of 1852, or the beginning of 1853, that he openly proclaimed war against the Ras and defeated Prince Goshu, sent against him by that monarch. The Ras now understood the kind of man he had to deal with, and the sort of danger he had to meet. So he called upon his ally, the chief of Tigre, for military assistance, and sent a large army, commanded by his best officers, against the audacious rebel. The Royal army was immensely superior to the rebels in every respect; but Kassai managed with such consummate skill, and infused into his soldiery so much courage, that he succeeded in inflicting upon it a complete defeat. Not content with defending himself, Kassai marched against the Royal camp, and challenged the Ras to fight a pitched battle in the open plain. The challenge was accepted, and again the young rebel achieved a complete victory. The power of Ras Ali was now utterly destroyed, and Kassai had only to deal with the independent chiefs. Ubye, chief of Tigre, was the most formidable opponent with whom he had to cope, and against him he applied powers of intrigue quite on a par with his military genius. He affected to treat with Ubye as to which of the two should be elected supreme Sovereign.

In February, 1854, he agreed to the assembling of a Council of Notables, each of whom bound himself by an oath to accept the decision. And now the inevitable ecclesiastical element comes into play. There is always an Abbe in the case, and Kassai found that Abba Salama, the Coptic Abuna, or Primate favored his rival. It was pretty evident that the Council would elect Ubye, and that Abba Salama would crown him Emperor. So Kassai put himself in communication with the Romish Bishop, Jacobis, who had obtained a precarious footing in the country, and promised that he would adopt the faith of Rome for himself and the whole Empire if Jacobis would crown him Emperor. This was exactly the bait with which to catch a Jesuit, and Jacobis was properly secured. Kassai then resumed his war against Ubye, and the Coptic Bishop excommunicated him and his soldiers as perjurers. This did not trouble Kassai much, for had he not a bishop of his own? He told Abba Salama that if one bishop could cure, another could absolve; and hinted that he had better look out for his own position. The same bait that had caught a Romish Bishop soon caught the Coptic Abuna, and the result was that Abba Salama agreed to crown Kassai Emperor on condition that the rival Bishop and his priests were banished from the country. Pretty cunning management this, it must be admitted! By playing off the one priest against the other, he made both of them his humble servants, and secured his coronation at the hands of the recognized Primate of the country.

Early in 1855 this singular man was crowned Emperor, under the title of "Theodoros, King of Kings, of Ethiopia." The great drums were beaten in the market-place of Gondar, and the Abyssinian people were ordered, on pain of mutilation, never again to speak of Dedjazt Kassai. By this time he had reduced all the chiefs and princes of Abyssinia, and it is said that he showed them great forbearance in the hour of his victory. And now comes the brightest spot in King Theodore's history. No sooner was he seated on the throne, than he commenced to reform the administration of the country. He deprived the feudal chiefs of their despotic power, and placed the country under responsible government; he suppressed the slave trade, and purchased Christian slaves from the Mahomedan slave dealers to set them free; he introduced decent habits of dress into Abyssinian society, and supplied an example of conjugal fidelity new in the country. The improvements effected were indeed very great, and the expectations excited by the new monarch's inclinations and abilities were yet greater.

In June, 1855, the then British Consul in Abyssinia reported with much hopefulness on the prospects of the country under the new rule.

Early in Theodore's career, however, the monstrous pride, that now proving his ruin, became a prominent trait in his character. Crowned as "King of Kings," he thought that there is not in all the world so great a monarch as himself; and he probably considered that he was extremely condescending when he wrote to Queen Victoria in a strain of equality. This pride is of course greatly inflated by the belief that he is a Heaven-sent champion of the Christian faith. Theodore, be it remembered, is the name of an Emperor of Abyssinia who reigned centuries ago, and who, according to native prophecy, is to return to earth to restore the glories of Ethiopia. King Theodore believes himself to be this second edition of the ancient Theodore, and confidently expects that he shall yet seat himself on the throne of his "ancestor" Solomon, when he shall have driven the Turk from the Holy City. Certain it is that he considers it his duty to undertake wars against the Mahomedan neighbors, and that he has more than once indulged in crusades against the Gallas.

Many of the Abyssinians, sceptical about Theodore's right to be considered the Theodore of prophecy, from the fact that he comes from the northwest, whereas the genuine Theodoros Redivivus is to come from the east. No doubt crosses his own mind, however, and his mad pride carries him into the most enormous excesses. His state of mind may be inferred from the fact that, after his last great victory in 1861, he announced to the assembled clergy at Axum that he had made a bargain with God. "He [God] had promised," said Theodore, "not to descend on earth to strike me, and I have promised not to ascend into heaven to fight with Him." Indeed, it is pretty evident that King Theodore's character is now more than tintured with madness. The madness has some method in it; but it is not less clearly madness. Since the date of the above impious and insane remark, the character of King Theodore's administration has completely changed; and all the old evils of the land have returned in an exaggerated form. The country is delivered up to a licentious soldiery and the most fearful cruelties are everywhere perpetrated. The Negus now believes it his mission to be a curse and a scourge to his rebellious people; and he executes it with all the energy of his character. This has given the pretender to the throne, Yohannes Gwala, an excellent opportunity of rearing his head; and recent advices make it seem extremely probable that King Theodore's race is nearly run.

THE REV. ROBERT KENNON, Editor of the Mobile Conference, has been stationed at Lexington, in anticipation of a transfer to the Kentucky Conference. This is unpleasant intelligence to our Abba friends, and he has troops of them. But what is their loss will be great gain to our Kentucky friends. Brother Hargrove and his excellent family reached Lexington, Oct. 20. In a private note he says: "My congregations are large, and the way seems open for usefulness. A cheerful fire, a warm supper, and kind friends, awaiting our arrival. The spirit that dwelleth in us aloneth to envy. We hope all our brethren in going to their new charges will meet with such a warm reception."—Nash's Chris. Advocate.

Thad. Stevens.

Mr. Stevens says that the lawgivers of America are now as free to act as Sampson was when the fox had touched the flax with which he had allowed himself to be bound. The "venerable statesman" does less than justice to Sampson, who broke the ropes that bound him without the assistance of fire, and who never did any act, that we have heard of, analogous to the acts of the lawgivers aforesaid, except that he pulled down an edifice in which he involved himself and his enemies in a common ruin. Mr. Stevens concludes with a very gorgeous account of the future greatness of this country, the pertinency of which to his argument is not very apparent. That his predictions will be realized is very probable, if his counsels are not taken. Seriously, we think these last words of Mr. Stevens have as well not been published by his friends, as they seem only the dreamy utterances of a once vigorous mind now enfeebled by bodily decay.—Baltimore Sun, 31st.

elements of a powerful and noble manhood; unshuffled, they become the wild fiends of misrule and vice.
Such being the value of good government to the child himself, we may estimate its importance in the family or school where children are to be educated. Wo to the family where a weak or unwise government holds its sway; where lazy self-indulgence refuses to make the necessary effort to rule; or where fickle and petulant tempers hold their feeble and irresolute authority over irritable and irritating childhood. But happy the children of a wisely governed family. The noblest virtues have their seed-plot there.

The well governed school was never known to fail of valuable success, even though its book teaching were small and defective. The disorderly and ill governed school can scarcely hope to compensate, however excellent its methods of instruction, for the mischief its misrule will work to its pupils. Its habitual disorder will enter as a virus into their mental constitution, and will impress itself as a permanent de-formity upon the character.

The Sunday School forms no exception in its need of wise and good government; but the conditions of government in the Sunday School, are widely different from those in the ordinary day school.

The Sunday School is a group or cluster of schools. Each class forms a separate school with its own separate government. Each teacher rules his class, while the superintendent rules all. The good order of the whole depends upon the good order of each class. One wheel out of gear, the whole machine goes wrong.

Happily, most of the circumstances favor good order in the Sunday School. Its sessions take place on the Sabbath, and childish waywardness is partially overruled by the sanctity of the place and the day.

The lessons, too, are religious and inspire serious thought. The known Christian character and aims of the teachers help the effect. Even the clean, Sunday clothing of the children promotes the tendency to good order. The session, held but once a week, has a holiday air about it, and its length is not such as to weary the patience of either pupils or teachers. It must be a singular lack of carefulness or capacity, which, with so much to favor, cannot maintain good order; but the condition of too many of the schools prove that this lack is far too frequent. A few hints to those who have not sufficiently considered this important subject, may help to cure the evil, and give new beauty and success to this noblest effort of modern Christianity.

1st. Government has two parts or elements, first, putting in order; second, keeping in order. No one can keep that in order, which is not first put in order.

2nd. Putting in order implies some plan of order. The coaxing of chilling a hundred people into momentary quietness is not getting them into order. Order implies system, plan, and purpose—a study of the fitness of means to ends.

3d. Order, to be perfect, must be complete and comprehensive. If some things are put in order and others are not, then disorder is invited through open doors. Whatever is not in order is itself a disorder. Here lies the fault of most poor governors. They govern in patches.

The good school governor puts everything in order; persons, movements, times, things. He will arrange his classes with an eye to comfort, convenience, and taste.
He will drill his classes to move in quiet, and with order, whenever they have occasion to change seats, to visit the library, or to leave the school. He will especially keep time, beginning each exercise at its time. He will see that every article in the room is kept in place, and that the room itself is a scene of perpetual neatness and order. And, finally, he will keep himself in order, a model of quiet, and intelligent attention to his own business. The poor governor often sins against all these requirements, but especially against the last. Mistaking confusion for the activity of earnest work, and noise for enthusiasm, he is never content unless he is stirring up himself and all around him into a perpetual hurly-burly.

4th. The preservation of order requires that each disorder be suppressed the moment it appears; not by angrily creating a greater disorder, but by restoring as quietly as possible the old order. The most effective school governors merely pause whenever a disturbance occurs, and wait a minute for quiet to be restored, and then go on in order.

5th. Keeping order implies also progress in order—a live order, growing ever into new and fresh plans and aims, not a mere dead and fossil order, which perpetually does the same things in the same way.

The foregoing hints contain for the thoughtful reader the very gist of this subject of government. A few more specific suggestions of plans will be acceptable to many superintendents.

1. Let the superintendent gain and employ the attention of the school from the outset. A good plan is to train the pupils to move as quietly as possible to their seats when the hour comes, while a hymn is sung, so familiar that all can join in it without a book.

2. Let him pause till every one is still, before beginning the introductory exercises; and when any disturbance or noise occurs, let him wait a minute for all to get still again.

3. Let the time for beginning the recitations be distinctly announced, and let no interruptions of other business mar the quiet and beauty of that sacred time. It is due to the teachers and their pupils that this hour be given to the great central work of the school, with nothing to hinder its impressiveness and success. No impertinent visits of librarians or other officers should be allowed, and the superintendent's own visits should be so quiet, as to attract the attention of none but the class visited by him.

4. When the recitations close, let all the classes cease at once, and let the general work of changing books and making collections be the business of its own allotted time.

5. Let some general exercise again restore quiet and thoughtfulness to close with, and before any marked uneasiness begins, dismiss the school, not as a whole, but class by class, each filing out in order and silence, lest the noise and crowd of the breaking up spoil all the good impressions of the hour.

6. Make the government one of influence and example, rather than of hard authority. Let the order be felt rather than seen. The highest art conceals its artfulness. Happy the superintendent who can make the nicely adjusted system he uses seem the easy and natural course of things, and while he rules his school never show he rules. The quiet, sacred, home feeling, the pleasant, but impressive religious atmosphere, the sense of worship prevailing over the sense of work, these should never be lost sight of in the true Sunday School.

A superintendent may well take pride in the quiet, and the good government of his school. That beautiful scene of sacred order, repeated every Sabbath, will imprint itself ineffably upon the memory of the pupils, and will return with a hallowing power to them in after years. The very lessons they study and recite gather a new sacredness and power to influence from the impressiveness of the surrounding scenes. It is the golden setting of the picture, the rhythm-time-beat in the heavenly music, the assuring guarantee of the coveted good, the highest success.

that this man cannot refrain from joyously adding, however distressing his outward circumstances may be,
"Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disqui-etted in me?"

But we have referred to this old farmer and his pocket-book for another purpose. His book was to him something more than a mere apparatus of leather and pasteboard, it was a companion for his soul; it had a voice, and could speak to him; nay, so fallen was he, that the pocket book could commune with the poor heart on its own level, and could minister to its miserable consolation. Will the reader permit me to suggest a happier use for his pocket-book, in the way of an occasional conference with it—a use for it in the closet as a humble handmaid to the Bible. Employed in this way, from time to time, no longer the Bible's rival, but the Bible's ally, the reader may find that his pocketbook is an excellent aid towards self-knowledge; and can give him better help for eternity, than its contents, whatever they may be, can do for time.

And we need some such subordinate plain-speaking teacher; which, taking up the Bible lesson, shall so apply it to our individual selves, as to leave us in no doubt whether or not we are truly submissive to the divine Word. The Bible itself plainly tells us what, as Christians, we are responsible for being and for doing; it also plainly tells us how we are to get the needed help for so being or so doing; but there is a minor question, yet of great importance, to which the Bible furnishes no direct reply. And the question is this: Am I, who profess to have taken up my cross, and to be now following Jesus, so employing these spiritual helps as actually to live, in some degree, conformably to my lofty calling? To settle this, we must not trust our own hearts, for they are deceitful, nor the testimony of our friends, for they are partial; we must seek other witnesses, and we shall find none more truthful or more useful than our own pocket-book. It will neither flatter us nor slander us, but will tell us the simple truth; only our hearts must be sufficiently guileless not to misinterpret its testimony.

For the pocket-book, rightly consulted, will tell us a great deal about the reality of our profession.
A cabman, who had been rough and cruel to all about him, said after his conversion, "Why, sir, my very horse knows that I am a new man." And something similar is the case in every true conversion.

Among other changes, the pocket is sure to be converted as well as the tongue. That profession of faith is a very unsatisfactory one which does not lay the purse, with its contents, at the Saviour's feet.
The true believer gives his own self first (2 Cor. viii. 5); and this secures that he also give his all.
So then, though a man may have got a new mouth, which can speak fluently the language of Canaan; and though he may have got a new creed which has in it every ac-knowledgeed Christian doctrine, sharp and clear; and though he may have got a new set of habits, and a new circle of friends—let him not be satisfied with these, unless he has also got a new pocketbook. Without this, all the rest is likely, is but vanity of vanities.

The old pocket-book was either one of his idols hitherto, or, at the least, one of the unholy implements degraded to the worship of the grand idol, Self. Has he now cast all his idols with their temple furniture to the moles and to the bats? Has he now got in his pocket a pocket-book which is no longer his, but his Master's; and which is entrusted to him for a little, but entrusted to him as a mere steward, who is to use it all according to the Master's plain instructions.

Now, if any one wishes to get satisfactory light on the reality of his Christian profession, let him not overlook this plain and practical aspect of the question. He will be in less danger here of getting lost in the quicksands of metaphysical casuistry. Unbelief is fully as likely to lurk in the pocket-book as anywhere else, and it can often be more easily detected here than in the creed. There are many whose verbal confession is all that can be desired, whose system of doctrines is perfectly orthodox, whose general walk is morally blameless; but who, if they were to examine conscience in the light of the Bible, and by the help of the pocket-book, would find that, instead of being already within the kingdom, they are not even attempting to walk towards it. Indeed, so far from having any controlling sense of responsibility to God for all that they have or can do, they are prepared to resist the practical enforcement of his claims; and if he were to say to them, as he once said to the young man in the gospels, "Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor," they also would be sure to go away very sorrowful. They should be indeed be very happy to be assured of having fellowship with Christ in the heavenly glory, after the present life of selfishness is over; but to have present fellowship with Christ in the daily use of their own pocket-books, why, they could scarcely consent to this. And yet it was on a similar point that Abraham's faith was tested, and was gloriously triumphant. He was called to leave his country, and to give up all for God; and he did it. He was commanded to offer up his beloved son; and he rose up early in the morning in his instant readiness to obey. We, too, are called on now to walk along a path as trying to flesh and blood; do we too hasten to obey the call? Whether we do or not, this much is certain, that all who are Abraham's children have the spirit, and do the works of Abraham (John viii. 39).

Wherefore, in settling this weighty question regarding the genuineness of our Christian profession, let us, by no means, overlook the evidence of the pocket-book.

tom that may now be regarded as established on national consent and approval, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to my fellow-citizens that Thursday, the 28th day of November next, be set apart and observed throughout the republic as a day of national thanksgiving and praise to the Almighty Ruler of nations with whom are dominion and fear, and who makes peace in his high places, resting and refraining from secular labor on that day.
Let us reverently and devotedly give thanks to our heavenly Father for the mercies and blessings with which he has crowned the new closing year; especially let us remember that he has covered our land through all its extent with greatly needed and very abundant harvests; that he has caused industry to prosper not only to our fields, but also in our forests. He has permitted us to multiply ships upon our lakes and rivers and upon the high seas, and also, to extend our iron roads so far into the secluded places of the continent as to guarantee speedy overland intercourse between the two oceans.

He has inclined our hearts to turn away from domestic contentions and commotions consequent upon a distracting and desolating civil war, and to walk more and more in the ancient ways of loyalty, conciliation and brotherly love. He has blessed the peaceful efforts with which we have established new and important treaties with foreign nations; while we have at the same time strengthened our national defences and greatly enlarged our national borders. While thus rendering the unanimous and heartfelt tribute of national praise and thanksgiving which is so justly due to Almighty God, let us not fail to implore Him that the same Divine protection and care which we have hitherto so undeservedly and yet so constantly, enjoyed may be continued to our country and our people through all the generations forever.

In witness whereof I have here-unto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the 19th day of October, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, and of the independence of the United States the ninety-second.

A GOOD AGENT.

The Rev. Dr. Winfield of the Little Rock Conference sets a fine example to many of our preachers. He has not become too much devoted to the work of the ministry to neglect the work of a Methodist Preacher. He solicits subscribers for the several Advocates—and obtains them too. We are indebted to him for quite a number. If St. Paul were living, we doubt not he would be a DD. and an LLD. and a good agent withal for building Churches, endowing colleges, getting subscribers to the Advocates, besides bringing up large collections to Conference for widows, orphans, superannuates and the missionary cause.

During the past year more than $3,000,000 have been invested in various manufacturing enterprises in San Francisco.

The chief restaurateur of the French Department in the grand Exposition is said to be bankrupt. His liabilities are estimated at $300,000.

In New Haven Conn., fish-hooks are made by machinery at the rate 200 per minute.

The solid contents of Iron Mountain, Mo., are estimated at 230,000,000 tons.

THE COLLECTIONS.

By the time this number of the Advocate comes to hand, the yellow fever will, we trust, have disappeared from the face of the country, and the people will be ready to present their offerings to God, in grateful acknowledgement of the boon of continued life. Even the poorest will bring the handful of fine flour, 'a few almonds,' a 'turtle-dove,' or 'two furthings,' and with cheerful gladness place at the service of the Saviour, the gift of their hand. Gratitude and devotion have their harvest-season, their annual, as well as their yield from the dews of heavenly grace, and the sunshine of Divine favor. As long as we can remember, there have been certain great claims which wait, as angels from Heaven, to receive for the King this annual tribute. And no obligations can be stronger than these which, so to speak, we were born under; the obligation to sustain the preachers, helpless through age and service, and the widows, and the orphans of Itinerant Ministers—men who have left their families to the care of Churches, which while living they served; and the obligation to support the missionary who represents the Church, and in distant parts of the world, among heathen tribes preaches the gospel.

These obligations have not the force of charities merely; they are a part of the condition upon which our life received its cast. Like the necessity to labor, to contribute bread to our offspring, or a support to our parents, these demands are to be set down as having precedence of all personal indulgence, and comfort. A child of God cannot plead poverty as a reason for not sharing his morsel with those whom Providence has made dependent upon him.

To feel this we have but to call up the names of these Superannuates, and those Conference widows—names the most venerable, associated in our memories and thoughts with self-denial, with zeal, with love unfeigned, with pureness, with the armor of righteousness, with watchings, with fervent prayers, with unblameable lives and Christian temper, with all that to our hearts, is both lovely and holy. One such saintly man we presented two weeks ago, in this column, in the portrait of his own letter, written scarcely a day before his death; and we present now, another aged servant of God, as portrayed in a letter from his widow, writing a week ago.

"Five months to-day, since my sainted husband went to dwell with the 'saints in light.' I know it is selfishness in me to wish him back, yet I feel that he must come home. Every day seems more gloomy and desolate. When I returned from your city, last fall, I found him sick, and from that time, for about six months, he was a great sufferer. The glorious scenes that transpired in his sick room, cannot be told on paper. He had made arrangements to meet his dear brethren at Conference; this he was not permitted to do, he often spoke of you in the most endearing manner, and wished to tell you how much he loved you. He prayed devoutly for the prosperity of the La. Conference, never forgetting it until the last.

"Before he was confined to his room, when walking in the yard, he said there seemed to be a beautiful light over his head, all the time; and whenever he looked up, it came down and covered him all over. He would clap his hands and praise God. As his body grew weak his mind became clear and heavenly. You know he seldom laughed; but the last week of his life, he was in such perfect ecstasy that he laughed almost constantly. He often spoke of 'Angels being about him, one at each bed-post watching and taking care of him.' He had but one regret, and that was to leave his dear wife—as he expressed it—in this cold, comfortless world, all alone. I asked him if he wished to have his remains taken to Ohio, and laid with his people? He replied no, I love the South, I am identified with the La. Conference, let me sleep on our Southern soil, and let my dust mingle with my Southern brethren."

Oh my Brother, he was so good, so unselfish! how can I pass the long winter evenings without him! God help me!

Such are the holy men and noble women, who have spent a life for us, from its early morning to its evening, who have borne 'the burden and heat of the day,' whose declining years and trembling steps, we are permitted by heaven to support. There is no sweeter office, as there is no duty more sacred. We cannot wonder that some of the Conferences, order that the character of the preacher who neglects taking up Collections for superannuates, widows and orphans, shall not pass; but what shall we say of those Methodists who, from any cause, do not send up a share of their substance to meet this pious claim? How can they reasonably expect, if omitting or neglecting this, either the blessing of God upon their labors, or His answer to their prayers?

It is these stupendous sins of omission which accumulate a mountain weight upon the conscience of the Church, which retard the advance of God's Israel, and sully the glory of Christ's cause. These selfish, cold, narrow, luxurious, and worldly professors of Christianity who consumed on themselves the immeasurable substance, which God poured upon the Church, have at length plucked down ruin upon themselves and others. They have demonstrated that the conditions of abundance are not the most favorable to the apostolic spread of Christianity; that fulness paralyses charity. Therefore it is, that God now waits to receive from poverty, the offerings and the gifts which He expected in vain from baptized wealth.

The gospel must spread, or die out. Its law is that of 'leaven' the whole must be leavened. The Church that will not send missionaries outside of itself, to the regions beyond, or refuses to support its missions; will soon cease to be a Church. Individual Christians, who have the Holy Scripture themselves, but upon the plea of saving men at home, refuse to spread the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, or give to foreign missions, are not worthy a place or name in the Household of the Redeemer of men. We hope and pray that no stern winter of want, or penury of soul, shall repress the noble aspirations of our people, which would emulate the example of the Saviour and the Disciples, which starting forth from 'Jerusalem' seeks to preach the 'gospel to every creature.'

THE CAMPAIGN ENDED.

The Northern Christian Advocate, concludes an editorial written previous to the recent election in New York, with the words, 'Our campaign is ended.' It occurs to us, that there was more prophetic wisdom in the statement than the reverend Editor supposed, and that the Methodist corps of the Radical party has been put hors du combat. The ingratitude of politicians is about on a par with that of Republics. Having availed themselves of the pious and patriotic services of the bishops, the renowned secretaries and editors of the Church, and having arrived at the objective point where loyalty becomes remunerative, the radical leaders have with cool deliberation given up their ecclesiastical allies and turned to the Gentiles. In the recent Radical platform, Negro Suffrage, the Temperance and the Sabbath questions were left out. The language of the Syracuse District Convention of M. E. Ministers, held Oct. 8th, tells the whole story, sad as it is:

Resolved, That we consider that the party has turned its back upon its greatest element of strength, and upon the friends who have given it every victory, and have chosen rather infidel and intemperate Germans, and has thereby become a Lager Beer and Sabbath-Breaking party.

During the war there was no end to the uses of this religious element. Mr. Lincoln said it was not the fault of the Methodists, if they did more to support the war, than any other Church. And after the war he and Mr. Stanton entertained the Northern Bishops with becoming gravity, and surrendered to them virtually, the care of all the Churches they might be able to find belonging to Southern Conferences. The understanding was cordial between the Cabinet and the Church. In the words of the editor, at Auburn, N. Y.

'The party began well, and has done well in many respects, for which we give it due credit; but in many other respects it promised better than it has done, and has now reached a point, we honestly fear, when disappointment is its chief characteristic with all true and earnest men.'

Yes it 'began well'; but alas! this world is so given to change! This same party that 'began' so well 'has turned its back upon its greatest element of strength,' and upon 'its friends who have given it every victory.' It has 'parted from its chief characteristic,' in other words, it consents to do without 'the brethren,' and what is worse, does not hesitate to say it. Leading New York politicians said in the hearing of a certain Mr. Danforth, who published it in the Northern Advocate. We will pass a resolution at our Convention, to keep the pulpit all right.' Danforth does not like this; he hopes 'the pulpit will speak as it never has before, and say to these milk and water advocates of rum-selling, Get thee hence Satan.' Danforth forgets that the said 'milk and water' characters are beforehand with him, and have said to the pulpit 'Get thee hence.' The politicians have for once, had less 'milk and water' than the preachers. Satan has dismissed the pulpit, not the pulpit Satan.

We are not therefore wholly unprepared for the somewhat gloomy statement of the Editor of the Northern Advocate.

This condition of things gives evidence that the party, as such, is not sound, is not reliable; it is not well based in principle. It is manifestly composed of elements with only a few points of contact, which have been pressed and held together by powerful outward influence, and as this pressure is removed, there is a falling asunder.

So that 'our campaign is ended' sure enough; it may be more completely ended than can be conceived or told. If the Northern Methodist Church is no longer identified in its fortunes with the extreme Radicals, it is simply because these Radicals have kicked it off. The bold spirit of Church prostitution has absolutely disgusted the politician. The wares were too cheap, and he turned away from them. Alas, 'among all her lovers, she hath none to comfort her! all her friends have dealt treacherously, they are become her enemies.' Even before the Radicals sink into the deep pit of universal contempt and defeat, they have cast off with loathing these men in the garb of ministers, who cling as vampires, and threaten with exhaustion and execration the Party, as they have done the Church, to which they belong.

It is well for the world, and the cause of Christ, that such a 'campaign' should come to an end. 'My kingdom is not of this world,' said the Saviour; and such combinations as that one which has existed, for the purposes of ambition and plunder, between Northern Bishops and the Secretary of War, and between Northern Methodism and the Radical leaders, bodes no good to man, and brings no glory to God. The whole country no less than the Church of God, will rejoice over this downfall of ecclesiastical politicians, and will read with profound satisfaction their dying wail.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL VISITOR.

The extraordinary success that has attended the Visitor, as well as the favorable reception with which it has met everywhere, has been more than gratifying to the friends of the enterprise. A few weeks only will elapse before we will put the first number of the second volume to press. To save expense, as well as to prevent embarrassment, it is highly important that we know, as early as possible, the number of copies that it may be necessary to strike off. We therefore earnestly request our preachers, Sunday-school superintendents, and parents whose children are not accessible to Sabbath-schools during the winter months, to send us their lists as early as may be convenient.

WHITWORTH COLLEGE.

By a note from the accomplished President of this Institution, we learn that a large number of pupils are in attendance. Those who have daughters, whom they wish to grace with a good education, will find the opportunity afforded them, in this Female College at Brookhaven. It is convenient to this city. There is an advertisement in our columns, which gives all information as to the cost of tuition, board, etc., of maintaining a pupil there, and we refer our readers to it; and to President H. F. LONDON, Nov. 13.—Late Florence dispatches say that the note from Mencheria has had a very quieting effect on the country. The press of Italy, however, are almost unanimously of the opinion of the impossibility of reconciling the differences existing between the Italian government and the people on one side, and the pope on the other.

The acting commander of Fifth Military District has himself immortal honor, by the pointment of our most distinguished fellow citizen, the Honorable King Cutler, the late "prize senator elect" from Louisiana, president of a bran new party organization in this State, the descending patron of the Republic and the Times, and ex-consistent a seat upon the once venerable bench of the old Pelican State. An admirable evidence of administrative ability, throwing completely into the shade the efforts of Banks and Sheridan, has been General Mower to the profound regard of our population; and reflect undying luster upon the history of his campaign against officers of Louisiana. No other remarkable act has been performed by military commander in Southwest.—N. O. Crescent.

Concerning Man.

Wonders at home by familiar cease to excite astonishment, thence it happens that many but little about "the house we in"—the human body. We upon a house from the outside, as a whole or unit, never think of the many rooms, and passages, and the ingenious arrangements of the house, or the wonderful structure of the harmony, and adaption of its parts.

In the human skeleton, about time of maturity, are 165 bones. The muscles about 500 in number. The length of the alimentary canal is about 32 feet.

The amount of blood in an averages 30 pounds, or full of the entire weight.

The heart is six inches in diameter and four inches in diameter, beats 70 times per minute, times per hour, 100,800 per hour, 772,000 times per year, $50,000 in three score years and and at each beat two and ounces of blood are thrown out, one hundred and seventy ounces per minute, six hundred fifty-six pounds per hour, and fourths tons per day. All blood in the body passes through the heart in three minutes, little organ, by its ceaseless duty.

In the allotted space The Palmitists gave to man, lifts the enormous weight of 700,200 tons.

The lungs will contain about gallon of air, at usual degree of inflation. We breathe on an average 1,200 times per hour, inhale gallons of air or 24,400 gallons a day. The aggregate surface of air cells of the lungs exceeds 600 square inches, an area nearly equal to the floor of a twelve feet square.

The average weight of the of an adult male is three pounds and eight ounces, of a female pounds and four ounces. Nerves are all connected directly or by the spinal marrow. These nerves, together with branches and minute ramifications probably exceed 10,000,000 in number, forming a "body guard" numbering by far the greatest ever marshaled!

The skin is composed of layers, and varies from one to one-eighth of an inch in thickness. Its average area in adults estimated to be 2,000 square feet. The atmospheric pressure is about fourteen pounds to the square inch, a person of medium size subjected to a pressure of 10,000 pounds! Pretty tight hug.

Each square inch of skin contains 3,500 sweating tubes, or pores, tiny pores, each of which is likened to a little drain the fourth of an inch long, making aggregate length of the entire face of the body of 201,168 feet, a tile ditch for draining the almost forty miles long.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

From the Children's Hour.
GRANDPAPA.

Grandpapa's hair is very white,
And grandpapa walks but slow;
He likes to sit still in his easy chair, While the children come and go.

"Hush! play quietly," says mamma;
"Let nobody trouble dear grandpapa." Grandpapa's hand is thin and weak.
It has worked hard all his days;
A strong right hand, and an honest hand,
That has won all good men's praise.

"Kiss it tenderly," says mamma;
"Let every one honor grandpapa." Grandpapa's eyes are growing dim;
They have looked on sorrow and death, But the love-light never went out of them, Nor the courage and the faith.

"You children, all of you," says mamma,
"Have need to look up to dear grandpapa." Grandpapa's years are wearing few,
But he leaves a blessing behind—A good life lived, and a good fight fought, True heart and equal mind.

"Remember, my children," says mamma,
"You bear the name of your grandpapa."

THE ANT LION.

I was going into a deep forest alone on foot, with my blanket, and food, and cooking utensils on my back. The day was very hot, and the road seemed very lonely and long. Just before plunging into the woods, I passed over a piece of land which some hunter's fire had burned over. Nothing was left but here and there a tall stump of a tree, blackened by the fire and entirely dead, and now and then a great rock which had its covering all burned off, and which was left to be pelled by the storms. Under the shadow of one of these huge rocks I sat down to rest. Every bird was still, and every leaf hung motionless on the trees, and the only sound to be heard was the murmur of a distant waterfall, far away in the forest.

"I am now," said to myself, "beyond the reach of men, and almost beyond animal life. I can't see a living thing moving; this is solitude!" Just then I noticed something that caused the sand to fly up from the middle of my footpath, and looking carefully at it, soon satisfied myself what it was. It was a small insect that had burrowed down in the sand, and with his tail or some other apparatus (I could not see what) he was throwing up the sand fast and thick. How it flew! In a few minutes he had made for himself a hole about the size and depth of a large coffee-cup. It was shaped very much like a coffee-cup, as nearly as the dry sand would take that shape. The sand was dry in a few moments, and of course would very readily roll down into the centre. I had read of the creature, but had never seen one before. He was a little, dark-looking fellow; and now he put himself in the very centre of his den, and pushing himself into the sand, there was nothing to be seen but a little black horn, as it appeared to be, sticking out in sight. It looked as if it might be the point of a small rusty needle. This was the ant lion, and that was his den.

After the sand was dry, and while the hunter was still buried in the sand, I had specimens of his skill and power. A little red ant came running along, seeking food for herself and her young. So she climbed upon the rim of this sandy cup, and peeped over to see if she could see something. Presently she seemed to suspect danger, and tried to scramble off. Alas! it was too late; the sands rolled under her feet, and down she went to the bottom; when, in an instant, that little black horn opened like a pair of shears, and "clip" and the poor ant had one leg cut off? Now she saw her danger, and struggled to mount up the sides. The lion did not move or show himself. He knew what he was about. And now the poor thing struggled to climb up; but one leg is gone, and she finds it hard work. But she has got almost to the top and almost out, when the sands slip, and down she rolls again to the bottom. "Clip," go the shears, and a second leg is gone.

She now seems terrified beyond measure, and struggles hard; but she gets up but a little way before she slips again, and another leg is off. She now gives up the struggle and the lion devours her in a few minutes; and then with a snap of his tail or paddle, throws the skin of the ant entirely out of the cup, and the trap is set for another. A fly crept down to see what was smelling so good there; and again "clip," and his wing was off! and he has a second course of the dinner. I found several more such dens, and around them lay the skins of the dead, but the inside looked clean and innocent. There was no lion to be seen but the destroyer is there! The dead are shoved out of sight.

O, ant-lion! you are a preacher to me. I now see how it is that our young men, as they walk over sandy places, have the r feet slide. They go into the hole. It is all fair and inviting. They take a glass of drink; and "clip," they are crippled. They will soon roll back and take another, every time the destroyer cutting off their power to escape. They go to places of sin, and know that the dead are there! Every fall makes the next easier, and the possibility of escape less and less.

I see how it is with our children. They go into the streets, they fall into bad company, and every profane word they hear, every improper word, is like having a leg cut off; they go feebly, and can hardly escape ruin.

O, ant-lion! I wish all our children could see thee, so cunning for mischief, so cruel to thy victims, so much like that great lion, the wicked one, who seeketh "whom he may devour."—Rev. Dr. Todd.

After these beautiful experiments, which had, for the first time, made us acquainted with the manner in which an excitation is propagated in the nerves, M. Helmholtz imagined another method, which permits us to analyze the phenomena, even in their minutest details. In this, also, the muscle lifts, when it contracts, a movable lever; but this lever carries a point which leaves a white trace on a revolving cylinder, covered with lampblack. A particular arrangement makes the same point mark when the excitation takes place; from that moment until the moment the contraction commences, the point traces a straight line in the lampblack. When afterwards it is lifted by the tension of the muscle, it describes a curve, the appearance of which allows us immediately to see all the different phases of the movement of contraction. By this means, M. Helmholtz has discovered that the velocity of the nervous current was twenty-seven metres. He has, moreover, demonstrated, that the tension of the muscles increases gradually the instant the movement begins, until it attains a maximum after about the five-hundredth of a second, to decrease again afterwards until the muscle has returned to its natural state.

The second apparatus of M. Helmholtz has received the name of myograph. It has been perfected, or rather modified, by several physiologists. The great difficulty was to measure exactly the time corresponding to the different points of the tracing which the point executes on the cylinder. M. Helmholtz made the cylinder of his apparatus move by a clockwork, which indicated, at sight, the duration of the rotation. This means has been replaced to advantage by the use of the tuning-fork. Dr. Marey, in his course of medical physiology, made use, for this purpose, of a tuning-fork, which made five hundred simple vibrations a second; these vibrations wrote themselves on the cylinder alongside of the curve traced by the extremity of the muscle; it sufficed to count the number of vibrations inscribed parallel with a part of the muscular tracing to get immediately the time corresponding to this tracing. M. Marey found, by this process, velocities of transmission, which varied from ten to twenty metres.

The nervous current, moreover, propagates itself more slowly at low than at elevated temperatures. Dr. Munk has discovered, besides, that the velocity is not the same in the different parts of a nerve; in the motor nerves, it seems to increase towards the point of connection with the muscle. Finally, according to M. de Bézold, this velocity diminishes when the nerves are under the influence of an electric current. It was necessary now to repeat these experiments upon man. This is the manner in which they could be conducted: an electric current produces a slight sensation of pain at a point on the skin; the instant that the current acts is marked on the revolving cylinder of a chronoscope. As soon as the person experimented on feels the shock, he gives a signal by touching an electric key, and a new mark produces itself on the same cylinder. The interval comprised between the two marks is measured, and the time that has elapsed between the two signals is obtained. This time, which is from one to two tenths of a second, is composed of several parts,—the transmission of the external impression to the brain, perception, reflection, the transmission of the will to the fingers, the muscular contraction which is its result; but if the excitation be produced successively at two different points of the skin, these delays are always the same, except that which proceeds from the transmission of the sensations. If, for example, a point of the great toe be first excited, then afterwards a point of the inguinal region, the difference of the delays observed will represent the time which the sensation takes to mount from the foot to the middle of the body.

These experiments were first made in 1861 by M. Hirsch, director of the observatory of Neuchâtel, by means of an apparatus which it would take too long to describe here. The person experimented on touched with his right hand the electric key at the moment that he experienced this slight pain, which may be compared to the prick of a pin, produced by the pincers of an inducting bobbin when it touches the skin. The pincers was successively applied to the cheek, then to the left hand, and lastly to the left foot. The time lost by the transmission of this excitation to the point touched to the right hand was found equal in the three cases, to eleven, to fourteen, and to seventeen hundredths of a second respectively; three hundredths of a second were then necessary for the sensation to arrive from the left hand to the head and six hundredths for it to arrive from the foot. M. Hirsch concluded from this that the nervous current passed through a length of two metres in six hundredths of a second, or thirty-four metres in a second. Dr. Schellke resumed these experiments in a more complete manner at the observatory of Utrecht. He found twenty-nine metres and a half to be the velocity of transmission of sensations in the human body. The same experimentalist has demonstrated that the transmission takes place in the spinal marrow with the same velocity as in the nerves. This result is so much the more remarkable since the nervous tubes undergo great changes on their entrance into the spinal marrow, where, according to M. Van Deen, they cease to be sensible to the action of electricity, of chemical substances, of mechanical wounds, etc.

It results from all these experiments that the nervous current propagates itself with a velocity relatively inconsiderable. The hand which hurls a stone cleaves the air with a velocity of twenty-two metres a second, which is quite comparable with that of the nervous fluid; the hare and the greyhound go quite as fast. The arterial fluid, which travels nine metres in a second, only goes three times as slow.

When the sensation transmitted to the spinal marrow gives place to a reflex action, that is to say an involuntary movement determined by the intervention of the glandular cells, the reflex movement always produces itself later than that which is provoked by the direct action of the exciting current on the muscles; the delay varies from a thirtieth to a tenth of a second. From this we may conclude that the reflex action in the spinal marrow takes twelve times as long as the transmission of an excitation through the sensitive or motor nerves.

The time employed in the operations of the brain is also some tenths of a second. Doctor Jaeger has measured it in the following manner: The person on whom he experimented was to touch the electric key with the left hand when he received an electric shock on the right side, and with the right hand when the shock came from the left side. The interval between the shock and the signal was found to be twenty hundredths of a second when this person knew beforehand from what side the shock would come, and twenty-seven hundredths when he was not forewarned; this seven hundredths of a second were employed for reflection. M. Hirsch has discovered that at least two tenths of a second elapses before an observer indicates by a signal the perception of a luminous spark or an instantaneous noise. In other experiments, it was arranged that the observer should touch the key with the left hand for a white spark, and with the right hand for a red light; in this he lost from three to four tenths of a second. It took, then, from one to two tenths of a second for reflection. M. M. Donders and de Jaeger have made the experiment in a somewhat different manner. The one pronounced some syllable; the other repeated it as soon as he heard it; a phonograph registered the vibrations of the word. When the syllable to be repeated had been agreed upon beforehand, the delay observed was two tenths of a second; in the contrary case it was three tenths.

Thought, we see then, is not born instantaneously: it is a natural phenomenon subject to the laws of time and space. In different observers, time lost is not the same: one perceives, reflects, acts quicker than another,—the result of temperament and fortuitous disposition. This explains the differences which have been ascertained between those astronomers who had observed the same phenomenon. The persons have never seen the passage of a star behind a wire at the same instant,—moreover, the difference between the instants noted, or what is called the personal equation of two astronomers, varies more or less according to circumstances and may increase or diminish in time. The education of the observer has much to do with it; M. Wolf has shown that the time lost can be reduced to a minimum through practice by means of a special apparatus.

An important conclusion is forcibly derived from these experiments: the nervous fluid is not identical with the electric fluid. Electricity propagates itself in the electric wires with an inconceivable rapidity: it outstrips light considerably; it has a velocity twenty million times as great as the nervous agent. There exists another capital difference between the two agents. Every alteration of the structure of the nerves stops the propagation of the nervous current; to bruise them or to burn them is sufficient to interrupt the transmission of the current; once cut, they no longer recover their power when the divided extremities are afterwards united. The metallic wires, on the contrary, conduct electricity in spite of every damage which can be inflicted on them. Nevertheless, the celebrated labors of Professor du Bois-Reymond clearly demonstrate that electricity plays some part in the nervous phenomena. There exist naturally electric currents in the nerves, and these currents are modified and influenced by the action of the nervous currents. We may then admit that the nervous phenomena are the result of a secondary action of electricity which produces in the substance of the nerves certain chemical or other changes; they manifest themselves only at the end of a certain time during which the action increases in a slow and gradual manner until it becomes sensible and provokes mechanical effects. This side of the question is still surrounded with an impenetrable obscurity; in it we are reduced to hypotheses more or less plausible. Nevertheless, we can say that a great step has been made towards the solution of the problem of life: the experiments of which we have given an account have thrown light on its approaches and have brought back the question on the ground of exact science. Much time will doubtless pass before the progress of methods of observation allow us to make an additional step towards the end, and nothing authorizes us to believe that we can ever congratulate ourselves on what has been already done, for the exactness of the results obtained has surpassed every expectation.

FARM AND GARDEN.

THE QUEEN BEE.—Generally within five or six days after emerging from the cell, the queen leaves the hive for a meeting with the drone, which takes place on the wing, and usually high in the air. She commonly leaves the hive between the hours of 12 and 3 o'clock P. M., when the drones are on the wing. If she does not meet with the drones, she returns to the hive, and in a short time goes out again. This she continues to do every day until she meets with the drone, and becomes impregnated, when she returns to the hive, not to leave it again until she goes off with a swarm. Having mated with a drone, she becomes impregnated for life, and, under favorable circumstances, commences to lay within forty-eight hours. In some cases it may be much longer, extending to five, six, or even ten days. Such cases, however, are rare.

Another peculiar characteristic of the queen is, that if she does not meet with the drone within the first twenty-one days of her existence, she becomes incapable of being impregnated, and hence never makes anything more than a drone laying queen. We here see the wisdom of the Creator in the provision of so many drones. The chances of the queen to be destroyed are numerous, the time for impregnation short, hence the necessity of her meeting with the drone as soon as possible, that she may retire to the hive, where the chances for her destruction are greatly lessened. An unimpregnated queen may easily be known by her slim, tapering abdomen, shy and rapid movements; the abdomen of the fertile queen being much larger and longer, and her movements more stately and regular.

The queen generally lives to the age of four or five years, though she usually ceases to lay eggs that will produce workers after the fourth year—in other words, her fertility ceases, and though she may continue to lay eggs, yet they will only produce drones. The consequence is, the stock will soon dwindle away and perish. A drone laying queen may easily be known by the way she deposits her eggs—they being scattered through the center of the combs, here and there groups of three or four; and although they are drone eggs, yet they are deposited in worked cells, and the cells are necessarily extended to accommodate the greater length of the drone, which makes the brood comb of a drone laying queen, when capped over, of a very uneven surface; the extended cells projecting far beyond the even surface of the uncapped worker cells, giving a very unseemly appearance. This may be readily observed in a movable comb hive. Such a queen should be removed and destroyed, and a fertile queen given to the stock; or in case a fertile queen cannot be had, worker eggs should be given to the stock, in order that they may produce for themselves another queen.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

N. O. WHOLESALE PRICES.

CAREFULLY CORRECTED AND REVISED WEEKLY.

(Made up from Actual Sales as they Transpire)

The large number of absentees, who have returned since our last issue, has imparted more animation to our principal throughfare and there has been a marked improvement in the retail business. There has also been some little movement in the wholesale trade from the execution of orders for the few country merchants who have made their appearance. Our leading staple has been in good request, but mostly at prices below the views of factors.

The river has fallen 6 inches since our last report, and is now 14 feet 6 inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—Arrived since the 8th inst., of Louisiana and Mississippi, 4135 bales, Tennessee 488, Mobile 862; together, 5485 bales. Cleared since the 8th inst., for New York 1691 bales. Stock in warehouse and on ship-board not cleared on the 12th inst. 44,582 bales.

The market closed on Friday at—16 1/2c for Good Ordinary, —to 17 1/2c for Low Middling, and 18 to — for Middling. Good Middling at 19 1/2 to 20c and Middling Fair at 21. On Saturday the sales were confined to 500 bales, at figures indicating no variation in prices, although, if anything, the advantage was on the side of buyers. On Monday the market continued quiet. The sales were confined to 1650 bales, while prices were decidedly easier for Low Middling and Good Ordinary—the former closing at 17 to 17 1/2c, and the latter at 16 to 16 1/2c—while Middling maintained its previous position. Yesterday the last dispatch from Liverpool referred to above, and the necessity of realizing, induced factors to meet the demand more freely and fully 2700 bales changed hands, mostly on the basis of 17 to 17 1/2c for Low Middling and 18 for Middling.

The receipts proper since Friday evening embrace 4623 bales, against 4119 during the corresponding period last week showing an increase of 504 bales. The receipts proper during the corresponding period last year comprised 13,124 bales.

Desirable lots of Low Middling and Strict Middling or Liverpool Good Middling, sold respectively at 17 1/2 and 18 1/2c, which were 1/2c less than would have been previously accepted, and stating, moreover, that none but very strict classification would command outside rates, we modify our quotations as follows:

SUGAR.—The receipts of Louisiana are increasing, but they are yet very light. There were sales on Saturday and Monday of 75 hogheads at 14 1/2c for Fully Fair, 15c for Seconds, 15 1/2c for Prime, and 16 to 16 1/2c per lb for Yellow Clarified. Yesterday 99 hds sold at 10c for common, very green, 12 to 12 1/2c for Common and Good Common, 13c for Good Fair, 14 to 14 1/2c for Prime, and 15 to 15 1/2c for Yellow Clarified. Of Cuba Sugar sales are making a jobbing way at 12 1/2c for No. 12; 13c for No. 13 1/2c for No. 14 and 15, and 15 1/2 to 15 3/4c for Nos. 17 and 18.

MOLASSES.—The demand has been good, although the supplies have increased. On Saturday and Monday 336 barrels, sold at 65c for Inferior, 72c for Common, 75c for Fair, 80 to 82c for Prime and 85 to 90c per gallon for Choice. A lot of 100 half-hogs Prime sold at 80c. Yesterday 115 hds sold in lots at 72c for Common, 82c for Prime and 85 to 90c for Choice.

FLOUR.—The market has not exhibited much activity since the date of our last review. Holders, however, have been more anxious to realize, and by making some concessions in prices were enabled to dispose of 2800 barrels, on Saturday and Monday, part on private terms and part at $7 50, $8 50 and $9 for Fine, $9 50 to $9 75 for Superfine, $10 75 to $11 for Double Extra, $12 25 to $12 75 and $13 for Treble Extra, and $14 to $15 50 per bbl for Choice Extra. Yesterday the market was firmer.

CORN.—Is in light supply, but the demand at present is only in a small way. Yesterday the market was much firmer and all there was left in first hands comprising 1230 sacks sold at $1 42 1/2 per bushel for Louisiana, $1 40 for poor Louisiana in bad order, $1 42 1/2 for ordinary White Mixed, Western, and $1 43 to $1 60 for Prime Yellow, Yellow Mixed and White. Arrived during the past three days 3571 sacks, 20 bbls in ear. Cleared for Mobile, Texas 460 sacks.

THE OLD HOUSE.

On the meadows,
On the road,
Through the bright
Toil of the day;
I stand beside my gate, with hand before My eyes.

The children laugh to see the household Gods I prize.

There was a time when this old home Was full of mirth and glee, When by the household Went and left it all to me—A house of vacant rooms, each made a sad Place
Of a missing voice, or dream of vanished face.

Now I need to pause before The mirror on the wall, And look my long bright ringlets out And say I was fair!
That quaint old mirror down, and packed It up last night, Stopped to trick my hair—for what Is left is white.

Years I used to sit
And watch the long green lane,
And who came in those old times, I cannot come again.
Now, still at evening my chair is turned That way;
Work where once I watched—I sat so Yesterday.

Now house is a pleasant place, But yet it grieves me now, Small completeness seems to say The world is narrow now.
So small for any one with festivals to Keep,
So small for a large enough, for few will Come to weep.

By old house, a long good by;
My hand is on your gate; Tears are gathering in my eyes,
I say no longer wait.
By old house, and after all, the love Which makes you dear, Come in the heavenly home which I am Drawing near.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Dr. Speer, of the Louisville Conference, has put in our possession a following letter from Rev.
W. Lambuth, one of our missionaries in China. For the entertainment of our readers we introduce here:

WRITING IN THE CITY TEMPLE.

Coming from the city, where I used to preach, I passed the temple where the great god was supposed to preside over the worshiped. The temple was with the smoke of burning incense and candles. By a little extra I could see, through this fog of smoke, the hideous face of the monster worshiped by the ignorant multitude.
A few minutes I was standing in the temple, quite sufficient to my eyes to ache. While I could see the smoke escaping from the crevices in the roof of the temple. A few well dressed were looking on and listening seemingly pleasure to the band which was for the benefit monster piece of music, which glaring eyes, looked upon Within the inner part of the temple, separated by a low partition, were several well dressed women, offering up their prayers.
I made a number of presents way of fruit, shoes, gowns, they were privileged to enter the immediate presence of the god and were supposed to enjoy his favor. I stood in wonder at the stupidity deluded heathens, and I then better understand how a god the power of darkness upon the minds and hearts of people, and especially when we know much more ready they are to believe a falsehood than the truth. All seemed to look upon me with wonder, and I thought it best to leave the open air, and instantly relieved to get out.

A SERMON.

During the afternoon, I took text, "The tree is known by its fruit." I endeavored to show people how wicked their actions were in the sight of the true God, and were disposed to laugh, but the majority it was evident word-stung their guilty conscience.

MONTHLY WORSHIP.

On the first and fifteenth days of the month the temples are crowded with worshippers. On each side of the temple you see a priest or two filling in the printed prayers to the views and wishes of each priest. The priests receive a handsome remuneration from the sale of these prayers, candles and incense. If should be any, as is often the case, they are unable to purchase prayers, candles, &c., they get no sympathy from the priests and can not thus expect the favor of the gods. The poor are ordered away lest they might attract the attention and annoy those who are able to pay for these favors. The priests have many devices to which they resort in order to attract the people and obtain their money.

Every worshiper goes provided with incense, candles and printed prayers, or they can be purchased at the temple door. It is often the case the temples are filled with worshippers, when others coming in and not willing to give much of their time, go through with a few speedy prostrations and then commit to the priests their candles and incense to be placed before the god as soon as space would allow.— These are taken by the priests and placed in a box kept for that purpose behind the god, whose eyes are supposed only to look forward, and who as the priest supposes, regards the worshippers with so much interest, that he takes no notice of what is going on elsewhere, and if in their view he does know it, he allows his servants to do many things which would not be allowed others. The candles and incense thus deposited are brought out the next day and exposed for sale. This is considered, by common consent, the perquisite of the priests. The people know this and give assent.
They say, "If his excellency does not now get the benefit of them (if you call smoking one's eyes out a benefit) he knows my intentions are good." These candles are made from the Chinese candle tree, grown in various parts of the Empire. I have often seen the people gathering the buds from the tree; it opens just as the cotton boll does. The incense is made from the sandal wood, found in the islands of the Pacific. It is prepared by mixing the saw dust of the wood with a paste and then rolling it around a small stick about one foot in length.
When dry is prepared for use.

A CHINESE PROPHECY.
The Buddhists are circulating printed notices purporting to be the prophecies of some nobleman direct from the seat of Government. These circulars state that a great and fearful scourge is to be poured upon the people, but if they will use every effort to circulate these they can, in a measure, be spared. Thousands of persons are eagerly purchasing these of the priests, and scattering them to the four winds.

THE GOD OF WAR.
The god of war has given notice to the people that on the fifth day of the fifth moon, ten days from this time, a great plague will be abroad in the land. The people are warned to be on their guard, and at midnight, if there should be any noise at the door, they must immediately pray to the goddess of mercy and by this means escape the scourge.
If any one should be attacked by the disease, he must have ready three different kinds of herbs which should be taken at once and his life will be spared. The scourge will commence exactly at 12 o'clock on that day. There will be ten woes: 1st. There will be commotion all under Heaven. 2d. Half of the population will die. 3d. Shanting province will be in great commotion.
4th. There will be a beginning of trouble in the interior. 5th. In Huangong the flood of waters will rise to Heaven. 6th. There will be a fearful scourge south of the Yangtze Kyong. 7th. There will be clothes and no one to wear them.
8th. There will be plenty of rice and no one to eat it. 9th. There will be roads and no one to walk them. 10th. It will be with the greatest difficulty that men will be able to live this present year.

DEATH OF A LITTLE CONVERT.

I visited to-day (19th of May) the little sick girl, Mary Kelly, who was formerly one of Mrs. L's scholars.
She has been greatly afflicted for the past two years; was baptized last Sabbath after publicly professing faith in Christ. She said last evening, "I am going to change my home now and I want you, grandmother, to go with me." She then arranged everything even to the disposal of her clothing. After that she never spoke. She seemed to put her trust in the Lord Jesus and died that night.

A MAN MAKING A GOD OF HIMSELF.

I have heard of a man beyond Suchow who has determined to make a Buddha of himself. He went out into a field and selected a mound, upon which he stood with clasped hands. A native Christian, hearing of this, went to see him.
He remained in that position some twenty-four hours before any one took notice of him. The people then brought him a little rice and afterward a bench upon which he sat. He continued in this position a few days, when the people gathered around and made a shed over him, and it is thus he hopes to become a Buddha. The people will, in time, deify and worship him.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

I make an extract from my Journal of May 28:

I have been greatly encouraged in my labors on this holy Sabbath.
I preached to a crowded house in and out of the city. Several persons desired the prayers of the Church, and one who has been on probation was unanimously elected by the church members to be baptized on the next Sabbath. She is the wife of one of our church members. We had good singing and much feeling. Some members of other churches were present. One young man came to me and said, "I was at Church last Sabbath, and have thought seriously of joining the Church, but I have hesitated for fear. I wanted to hand you my name last Sabbath, but I was afraid you would not accept me. I want to ask if it is possible for me to join the Church. I was present when little Mary Kelley died, and from that day to this I have thought more seriously about death. If you will accept me, then I will hand you my name." Being one of my neighbors, I invited him to come to my house and receive instructions with others at night and unite with us in prayer.

I thank my God for many evidences of answer to prayer. I feel the Lord is beginning a good work in our midst.

Playgrounds for Poor Children.

We copy the following from Good Words that our readers may see how much benevolent persons are doing in England for the benefit of children.

All who give an anxious thought, and who that thinks at all can do otherwise, to the present and future condition of the ragged children who swarm in our courts and alleys, will rejoice to hear that the first step towards supplying one of their greatest wants has been taken by the opening of a playground for the young outcasts in one of the poorest and most crowded districts of Marylebone.

For this great boon, which is likely to prove more valuable in its character of model and precedent than even for the positive good it may itself accomplish, we are indebted to Mr. Ruskin, who has provided the ground, and to the practical sense and active kindness of a friend, who has undertaken the charge of fitting it up and making all needful arrangements and regulations.

The plot of land is in an obscure corner among small courts and poor crowded dwellings. The approach from Homer Street, a narrow street leading from Crawford Street, Portman Square, is under an archway which forms the entrance to Crawford Place, a narrow passage which leads to the door of the playground. On one side of the space are three or four poor cottages, destined, when the new holder obtains possession, to be fitted up and let as lodgings to poor families. They face the wall of the playground, overlooking it from their upper windows, which in dry weather and on washing-days exhibit a quantity of clothes hung out on a pole to dry. This little row of houses forms part of Mr. Ruskin's purchase, and their neater appearance, when the transformation is effected, will be a great improvement to the playground and its surroundings. At the time of my last visit I found the door of the ground beset by little applicants for admission, some of whom on showing a ticket were allowed to enter, and at once seated themselves in the swings or joined in the games. The tickets cost a penny each, and are available for one week. Those poor children who had none to show were less fortunate than their companions; but a reason for the exclusion was given by the superintendent, who explained that an objection not arising from poverty existed in the minds of parents.
Many of the dwellers in the adjacent courts and streets are Irish Roman Catholics, and some of the priests, under terror of proselytism, have taught the poor people rather to expose their infants to the physical dangers and moral pollutions of the streets than allow them the benefit of safe and healthy exercise under Protestant care. We may hope that a better perception of the worth of the playground will either dispel this prejudice in the spiritual directors, or induce the parents to disregard their advice.

The ground, a long narrow slip of irregular form, is about thirty-five yards long, and rather more than ten yards across at its broadest end. A cottage, with its small yard and outbuildings, stands at this end, and commands a view of the children and their sports.— The superintendent of the ground and two other lodgers occupy this small dwelling. At present the ground is gravelled over, but the sharp pebbles hurt such little feet as are without shoes and stockings, and a change for the better might be made in this respect, especially as winter is coming on. But there are not many barefooted children now, and these are the newcomers.
There were many more when the playground was first opened; but its good influences have extended even to the clothing of the children, and it is hoped in time to get rid of bare feet and ragged attire. Whatever may be the dress of the little ones, the playground, when they are in it, presents a scene of real happiness and enjoyment. Five or six swings of different sizes, and of the simplest construction, are in constant request, so is a plank laid across a heap of gravel, and serving as a see-saw. Children are easily amused and made happy, especially when they have liberty in the open air; and the thirty or forty whom I saw in the ground seemed to find plenty of fun in dancing round holding each other's hands, or marching in procession to the singing of an arithmetical sort of rhyme, learnt by one of the girls at school, running thus:—

"One, two, three, four, five, I caught a fish alive;
Why did you let him go?
Because he bit my fingers so!" with the pretty little refrain:—
"Birdie, birdie, build your nest Upon the tree I love the best;
Up and down the ivy tree, Birdie, birdie, sing to me!"

which, though not of the highest order of lyrics, is suggestive of ideas more suited to childhood than the street ditties which were heard when the children first came to the ground, and which, the superintendent says, were really horrible. The language in common use was horrible too. It has been corrected, not by chastisement, which would only drive the children away, but by accustoming their young ears to gentler words and phrases, and by the influence of two or three older children, whose school training had brought them to a degree of civilization beyond their fellows, and who also had the advantage of knowing a few songs and child's plays, and the great pleasure attending amusements shared with others. Some of the little ones—those who had not acquired the manners of the playground—did not know how to shake hands with us; but when they had learned the art they practised it vigorously among themselves. Some of us may remember reading in the first records of a ragged school of one poor little child, who, when told to kiss her teacher, did not know how to do it, having never received that early mother's lesson. Such incidents give a truer idea than we can gain from description of the condition of the neglected little ones who, wanting parental care, ask for help and kindness at our hands.

I cannot say that bad words are never used now in the playground.
I heard none, and the marked improvement in language, manner, cleanliness, and healthiness of appearance, since the children had the use of the ground, gives reason to anticipate a still greater change for the better. It has often been said that the children of the poor have no childhood. The saying may be easily verified by watching the goings on of a party of ragged boys or girls in the streets. One does not see them play as children do who enter the world under better auspices. The children in well-ordered nurseries or playgrounds have amusements which either they have themselves planned, or which have been known among children from generations back, and the co-operation in such sports forms part of the training of the man or woman who will hereafter obey the laws, as he recognizes the value of law for the general good. Little girls often exercise a world of imagination in inventing scenes in which they, their playfellows, and their dolls, take part—anticipating the time when these toy babies will be exchanged for living children; and fathers and mothers may often see in these little dramatic sketches illustrations of their own parental treatment. I once watched two tiny mothers at play. The children, Lucy and Emmy, were "naughty, and would cry and kick." "What will you do to Emmy?" said one mamma. "Whip her," said the other, "but I'm afraid she won't mind that." "I shall kiss Lucy," said that young lady's little mother, "and then I know she'll be good." I have wandered away from the poor children, but the anecdote, childish as it is, is not foreign to my subject or purpose, as will be seen when we turn again to the little outcasts of the streets. Let us take a look at their usual recreations. The boys may be seen sometimes going along in troops, fighting and pushing each other, or spending their superfluous energies in shouting or singing such songs as were heard in the playground in its early days.

Or they will occasionally gain applause and halfpence by performing wonderful leaps and somersaunts for the benefit of omnibus passengers. These children rarely play together till they learn the first elements of gambling in chuckfarthing or pitch-and-toss, for marbles or buttons require room, and the space needed for tossing half-pence is often found before a public house or a cab-stand, in close proximity with all that is foul and impure to eye and ear. He is a happy boy who can reach one of the parks or Primrose Hill in line weather, to fly a kite or join in a game of cricket; but the ragged and poorest boys have not kites, and all cannot be admitted to the cricket match. Besides, many children live at too great a distance from the open grounds about London, and the little girls and babies are generally restricted to alleys or doorsteps in the streets.
Hoop, tipcat, and hopscotch, are sometimes attempted by enterprising characters, but they obstruct the pathway, and get in the way of horses and passengers, so the police are bound to suppress them.
Wooden battledores and shuttlecocks, and sometimes balls, succeed among the children who have a quiet nook spacious enough to play in. We, who have every sort of means and appliance at our command, often find it difficult to bring up our children in loving and law-fearing ways. We need not wonder that those who are outcasts from the cradle should grow up to be lawless men, having each his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him; for, though there is a kind of clan-ship and party feeling even among the roughest of the roughs, its effects differ widely from those which result from thoughtful union in a good cause. As it has been proposed to extend to each of these untrained beings the responsibilities of a vote at elections, it may be better first to consider fully their condition, and what influences have combined to produce it, and before talking, or listening to talk, about manhood suffrage, to use all the means in our power to make them fit to profit by the privileges already within their reach.

The little mamma who whipped and she who kissed her doll, are in a small way types of the two sorts of treatment to be tried on our naughty ragged children.— They have had whipping—whipping and cuffing from their parents; whipping, cuffing and knocking about in the streets; blows from each other when children; lighting when growing lads, and as a consequence police courts and prisons when grown men. It is plain they have not thriven under the treatment. It is time to try the other way, followed by Lucy's mamma, and treat the little ragged outcast children of the poor and worthless as all young creatures should be treated, giving them gentle words and kind looks, which they readily feel, and that which all children love, and ought to have—amusement, and freedom for harmless exercise in the open air.

Not far from the spot whence Good Words goes forth to the world, is the large new building, bearing outside the inscription,
"Field Lane Ragged Schools and Refuges." This immense building, erected at a cost of £20,000, contains (besides a training school, a servants' home, and a nightly refuge for the destitute) a ragged school, having on its books between seven hundred and eight hundred children. I lately watched these children as they came out from school and dispersed among the lanes and courts in the neighborhood. It was twelve o'clock, and many went straight home to their dinners, which, being often only a piece of bread and dripping or treacle, or for the older ones perhaps a herring and cup of tea, are soon disposed of, and then the children idle about in the streets and alleys till two o'clock, when school begins again, to last till four, when they again fall into their dirty surroundings till bedtime, "unlearning in the streets the good they have learned in school." Many of these are infants, carried about by children of five years old and upwards. They are frequently left by their little nurses in the infant schoolroom, to the embarrassment of the school-mistress, who good-naturedly takes care of the little waifs and strays till the reappearance of the little nurse, often after some lapse of time, if a Punch and Judy or other street dissipation has come between her and duty. The little girls are worse off than the boys, being so often encumbered with babies, and generally less able or ready to run about and pelt each other with dirt, etc., so their refuge is, as usual, a corner or doorstep. Any one who will take the trouble to visit this spot, which is close to the Farringdon Station, will see what an immense advantage a superintended playground would offer to the hundreds of children there assembled, whose amusements are now unavoidably carried on in the midst of filth, bad language, and unholy influences. If something be not done to them speedily, the case will be worse, for at present there are some natural playgrounds close to the school, vacant lots, which are to be let for building and which will not be vacant long. When these spaces shall be covered with brick and mortar in every form, the whole locality will be more crowded and less airy than it is at present. Land is dear in the city, but a large sum was raised for the school building, and a proportionately smaller sum to provide a playground for a district which sends seven hundred children to the school, would be well laid out in securing so valuable an auxiliary to its operations.

A STINGY METHODIST.—At the recent session of the Indiana Conference, Rev. Mr. Kiger narrated the following incident, which occurred in his district:

gentle words and kind looks, which
they readily feel, and that which
have—amusement, and freedom
for harmless exercise in the open

children there assembled, whose
amusements are now unavoidably
carried on in the midst of filth,
bad language, and unholy influences. If something be not done
to them speedily, the case will be worse, for at present there are some natural playgrounds close to
the school, vacant lots, which are
to be let for building and which
will not be vacant long. When these spaces shall be covered with
brick and mortar in every form,
the whole locality will be more
at present. Land is dear in the city, but a large sum was raised
for the school building, and a proportionately smaller sum to provide a playground for a district
which sends seven hundred children to the school, would be well laid out in securing so valuable an auxiliary to its operations.

recent session of the Indiana Conference, Rev. Mr. Kiger narrated
the following incident, which occurred in his district:

"A stingy old Methodist determined he would not pay his assessment for the preacher's support, and made the statement in his family that he would leave the church before he would pay his assessment. His little girl heard it and became violently agitated and commenced screaming as if in the greatest distress and terror.
At last she sobbed out, 'Pa, will you leave the church, will you not pay your quarterage?' She continued crying from supper time until ten o'clock at night, and until her father promised to pay his assessment and stay in the church.
The little girl immediately became pacified and soon went to sleep.
The old brother said: 'The little rat came near killing me before I gave up, but now, by the grace of God, I will do my duty.'"

A bed of fire-clay, 15 feet thick, equal to the best deposits of Europe, has been found within four miles of St. Louis.

The total length of railroad necessary to connect San Francisco with New York is 3,300 miles. The cars are now running over 1,985 miles or a little more than half-way.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

MADISON COUNTY, MISS.

Mr. Editor:—Bro. Cherry's remarks about the number of preachers sent from Giles County, Tenn., and your editorial under that heading, induced me to look over some results in Madison County, since I came to it in January, 1852. Among the results of the operations of Methodism here, is the licensing of twenty men to preach the Gospel, nine of whom were from one Church—Pearl River—where the late venerable J. R. Lambuth lived. Two of them were his sons. Nineteen were recommended to the Annual Conference, from this county. One of these discontinued for want of health, and concluded he had mistaken his calling, and now lives in your city, one was discontinued because the Conference thought he would never succeed in the work, one left for the P. E. Church, in his third year, two of them have died this year, one went to China, in 1854, where he is yet laboring as a missionary, one has been supernumerary for some six years, one is an ex-presiding elder, one has been Presiding Elder for six years, one is a College President, and the others are on circuits or missions in stations—all good men and true.

Madison County has, generally, neat and substantial church edifices. I have not seen better in any county in our State. The membership has not been very large, yet they have generally been substantial and true, pious and liberal—though in the last, there might have been some improvement. Our numbers have been reduced during and since the war by removals and death, yet others are falling into ranks.

There have been two Colleges, Madison for boys, and Sharon Female College, which have been of great service to the Church and Conference. We hope our glory has not departed.

You ask several questions about Giles County, answers to which would be interesting. There, sir, is "Pisgah camp ground," with from 100 to 150 tents, its annual meeting which has drawn together from 5,000 to 10,000 people to worship, where the converts have been numbered by hundreds annually. That has been the work for 30 or 40, if not 50 years past. Who has not, in North Alabama, and Middle Tennessee, been to "Pisgah camp ground?"

Then there have been good schools in that county. The large families of Lindseys, Howells, Browns, Paines, Hughes, Marks, Davises, etc., live up there; all of whom, from childhood, have been members of the Church. If some of them were to pass the tenth year of age without professing religion, it would be because of great distress in the families. My wife says the sixth year of their age. The county is dotted over with Churches, where there are large congregations.

Mr. Editor, just go up and spend next summer in this county. Take a look at its beautiful streams, grand old hills, get acquainted with the noble, hale, generous, singing and praying people, and you will not wonder that from that people, God calls and sends out ministers of the Gospel.

The Tennessee Conference held its session at Clarksville, Oct. 23-30, Bishop Paine presiding. We were glad to find the Bishop in good health and spirits—he presided with great efficiency and satisfaction, and his pulpit labors were eminent ly worthy of the man and of the occasion. His sermon on the unity of the Church will long be remembered by those who heard it.

The Conference was largely attended both by clerical and lay members, who were all most generously entertained by the hospitable citizens of the beautiful city in which the session was held.

The Missionary meeting on Saturday night—addressed in his best style by Dr. McFerrin, and efficiently managed by the President, Dr. Kelly—was a decided success; about $800 was raised, with a fine feeling in the large audience.

We heard a couple of masterly sermons—one profoundly argumentative, cogent, and clear, on eternal punishment, by Dr. Hanner; and the other by Brother Pitts, on the high position and important mission of the Church—a sermon of great pathos, power, and effect; we imagined what his eloquence and the results of it must have been in his pulpit days, when his voice like a silver trumpet "sounded out" among the thousands who attended his ministry. By the way, one of our good friends that we wot of, would have been delighted to hear so distinct an enunciation of the identity of the Church in all ages, as we heard with satisfaction in that discourse.

From the minutes promptly furnished by the able and courteous Secretary, Dr. Young, we condense the following particulars: There were 21 admitted on trial; 5 into full connection and ordained deacons, viz: B. G. Ferrell, M. N. Ford, R. W. Bellamy, J. H. Nichols, P. G. Jamison; 3 were re-admitted, viz: G. T. Henderson, J. M. Pirtle, J. R. Randle; W. W. Wither was received from East Tennessee Conference; 8 local preachers were ordained deacons, viz: J. West, A. W. Horton, A. T. Trentine, H. D. P. Hogan, D. P. Armstrong, G. W. Colman, J. Stamp, (col.), E. Foster, (col.); 4 traveling preachers were ordained elders: W. N. Moore, R. R. Jones, J. C. Phelps, R. P. Ganaway, and 6 local, S. P. Wright, T. J. Reed, N. B. S. Owings, H. S. Ledbetter, S. J. N. Taylor, J. Carneal; 2 supernumerary preachers, R. C. Jones and B. A. Sims, are supposed to have died. All the preachers were "passed," except T. J. Neely, who was suspended for one year. There is reported an increase of 3,400 white, and a decrease of 390 colored members—an increase of 69 local preachers. Only 697 infants are reported baptized, and 3,709 adults—the returns being imperfect. There are 281 Sunday schools, 1,725 teachers, 12,917 scholars. $2,900 was necessary for the supernumerary preachers, widows, and orphans, and $1,679.30 appropriated. $2,700 missionary money was reported. Some $7,000 was subscribed the last night of Conference for a ministerial education enterprise, the particulars of which, together with Reports, Resolutions, etc., are to enrich our next issue. The next session of the Conference is to be at Shelbyville, Tenn. The appointments, which follow, we believe give general satisfaction—they seem to have been judiciously made.

From the Carroll Record.

The District Meeting of the Lake Providence District, Louisiana Conference, M. E. Church, South, has just closed its session at Floyd, La. on the 21st day of October, A. D. 1867.

Among the many important subjects that came before that body for its consideration, the following are some of its transactions:

1. The Presiding Elder made the following report which was adopted: The spiritual condition of the District is good, considering that a majority of the preachers have been forced to abandon their respective fields of labor and engage in secular business; owing to the fact of the impoverished condition of our country—the overflow—being followed by the worms, they have left the District in a very deplorable condition. But, we have continued at our post keeping up our regular rounds of quarterly meetings; and we thank God that the cause has been gradually improving all the year.

We have had over one hundred and eighty accessions to the church, "and still they come." Give God all the glory.

The following named brethren were elected as lay delegates to the Annual Conference which will convene on the 11th day of December next, in New Orleans, to-wit:

Dr. Wm. S. McIntosh, Rev. T. B. Renner, Dr. Wm. E. Rapp, and Col. E. L. Wales. Also the following named brethren were elected as Resolves, to-wit:

John W. Cazy, Rev. Thomas M. Mann, Dr. Wm. M. Jennings, and W. W. Richardson.

Resolved, That E. J. Delony, be, and he is hereby appointed as agent and attorney in fact for the M. E. Church South for the purpose of making charge of whatever may be left of the M. E. Church in the town of Providence, it being the property of the M. E. Church, and we do hereby authorize and empower him to dispose of the same to the best advantage possible for the interest of the M. E. Church. And that he report to this quarterly Conference at its next meeting what action has been taken by him in regard to the same.

The following preamble and resolution were accepted:

WHEREAS, It is the duty of all our members to contribute to the support of the Ministers of the Gospel, laboring with and for us. And, whereas, there is a great scarcity of money among us just now; Therefore it be resolved by this body, that it be the duty of every member to give to their respective Stewards, (when money cannot be obtained) corn and pork, or other produce, which shall be turned over to the respective minister.

Be it further Resolved, That a copy of the above be forwarded to all the Stewards in the District.

W. G. McGAUGHEY, Pres't.
JOHN W. CAZEY, Sec'y.

Letter From Bishop Andrew.

The first-day, and the weekly prayer-meeting which followed this fast-day and prayer-meeting, was a fact in the history of the present year which will not soon be forgotten. There was, indeed, something sublime in the thought—a whole Church, numbering several hundred thousand souls, on their knees and calling on God at once? How much of honest confession of sin? how much earnest pleading with God for pardon of sin and for sanctification? how much prayer for others, even our enemies! how much and how deep the concern felt for perishing sinners! The people of God met and prepared themselves for a season of deep and hallowed communion with God. They met in the house of God to claim, in good faith, the promise of the Divine Redeemer, "Ask and ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find;" and Jehovah came into his temple, and into the tabernacles of the saints, to respond to the prayers of his people. The power of God was gloriously present throughout the Southern Church—it was a week much to be remembered. The Spirit was poured out from on high, and revival fires were kindled, and such a revival has been sweeping over the land as we and our fathers have not known for many years. How many thousands of precious souls are now shouting the high praises of our Redeemer, who six months ago were strangers and enemies to God by wicked works! but they have been brought nigh by the blood of Jesus. How many cold and backsliding or backslidden professors of religion have been warmed up and reclaimed, as the fruit of that week! Surely it can never be forgotten; and how many ministers of the gospel have been baptized afresh, and re-commissioned to publish the glad tidings of a full, free, and present salvation! Surely God hath done great and glorious things for his Church in the Southlands. Shall we forget or be ungrateful for these glorious results? No never! Rather let us cherish the remembrance of his gracious dealings with our people, and let us commemorate the anniversary of that week of prayer the next year with similar services; and wherever it is practicable, let the meeting be held at an old-fashioned camp-meeting, so that we may for that week give ourselves wholly to the work of prayer and praise. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name! Amen!

THE EDGE OF THE CATARACT.—A good many years since a steamboat was accustomed to make regular trips between Buffalo and Niagara Falls. The nearest point to which she could approach the mighty cataract was Chippewa Creek, about ten miles distant on the Canada side. One day there was a pleasure excursion, and several hundred men, women, and children went down from Buffalo.

After spending the day in all sorts of amusements—in looking upon the Falls, admiring the rainbow, passing under Table Rock and beholding the falling water, they gathered themselves on board the boat to ward night to return to their homes. By some miscalculation of the engineer, sufficient steam had not been generated, and when after passing out of the creek, the boat, mot the strong, rapid current of the river, instead of going forward, she was slowly borne backward toward the dreadful cataract.

The people on board, as may well be imagined, became instantly alarmed. The color fled from their cheeks—they stood in speechless horror—the roar of the cataract sounded fearfully distinct in their ears, as slowly, slowly, they were still borne back toward it.

At length the engineer bethought him of the oil with which he lubricated the machinery. He threw it into the furnace—the flames blazed up in tensely—steam was generated more rapidly—the wheels moved round with increased velocity—there was a pause as the Titan forces were contending for the mastery. A moment more, and there was an upward movement. Now slowly, slowly, the boat passed against the current. In a short time the point of danger was passed, and a long, heavy sigh of relief broke the bosom of every one on board.

A venerable gray-haired man was there among them. He lifted his hat and said, in a voice trembling with emotion:

"The Lord hath delivered us. Great is the name of the Lord. Let us pray."

And down upon the deck knelt the multitude, while the heartfelt offering of thanksgiving went up to God, who had wrought for them so great a salvation. But it did not end here. The feeling that had been awakened by the near approach of death did not, with all, pass away when the danger was over; as is very often the case. Even there, on the brink of that awful precipice, many found their Saviour. A revival followed in the church to which many of them belonged, (it was a Sunday School excursion) and many found peace in believing. One, a man of great wealth, dedicated much of it to God, in the building of a church, as a memorial of his gratitude for being snatched from destruction, both in this life and the life to come.

It is thus that the gate of heaven seems often hard by the gate of hell. God takes the heedless sinner and shakes him over the mouth of the pit. He trembles all over. He sees sin; he sees righteousness; he sees grace; he sees judgment; he sees love. He looks up and calls upon the name of the Lord. The Lord saves, and the delivered soul praised him forever. A new song is put into his mouth. He rejoiceth in the Lord.—Christian Treasury.

A STAR HIDDEN BY A THREAD.—David Rittenhouse, of Pennsylvania, was a great astronomer. He was skilful in measuring the sizes of planets, and determining the position of the stars. But he found that such was the distance of the stars, a silk thread stretched across the glass of his telescope would entirely cover a star; and, moreover, that a silk fibre, however small, placed upon the same glass, would cover so much of the heavens, that the star, if a small one and near the pole, would remain obscured behind that silk fibre several seconds. Thus a silk fibre appeared to be larger in diameter than a star.

You know that every star is a heavenly world, a world of light, a sun shining upon other worlds as our sun shines upon this world.

Our sun is 886,000 miles in diameter, and yet, seen from a distant star, our sun could be covered, obscured, hidden behind the thread that was near the eye, although in a telescope.

Just so we have seen some who never could behold the heavenly world. They always complained of dimness of vision, dullness of comprehension, when they looked in the heavenly direction. You might strive to comfort them in affliction, or poverty, or distress; but no, they could not see Jesus as the Sun of Righteousness. You might direct their eyes to the star of Bethlehem through the telescope of faith and holy confidence, but alas! there is a secret thread, a filament, a silken fibre, which, holding them in subservience to the world, in some way obscures the light, and Jesus, the star of hope, is eclipsed, and their hope darkened. There are times when a very small self-gratification, a very little love of pleasure, a very small thread, may hide the light. To some sinners Jesus, as Saviour, appears very far off; but far off as he may appear, he certainly can be, and shall be seen where the heart lets nothing, nothing intervene.

There exist in Mexico one hundred and ninety-seven different kinds of minerals.

The silk products of California for 1867 is 210,000 cocoons.

A VIEW OF ARARAT.—Toward the close of the year, wearied with the solitude, and the barbarous Gossack, we determined to leave Russia, and make our way into the ancient kingdom of Persia. We deviated from the usual route for the purpose of visiting Ararat. Accordingly made our way to the van, which is the capital of the district in which it stands, and the residence of a Russian Governor. Either from policy or courtesy had been provided with a Cossack escort, and so our arrival in a city rarely visited by strangers produced some sensation among its quiet inhabitants. Ere we entered, however, we paused upon the shore above it to catch the last glories of the sun falling upon Mount Ararat. It seemed to stand on the far stretching plain—before us, the world's great barrier-pyramid. Gracefully it rises to 17,500 feet without any mountain form to break the solitude of its reign. The leaves come on its side alone various the graceful outline of the whole. Its summit crowned with everlasting snows was now sparkling in dazzling brilliancy, and flooded with the golden light of heaven. Around the breast light vapory mists in soft hues hung floating; while below along the bottom boundless plain the baser mists of earth were gathering fast, brooding over the storied Araxes, whose silver line disappeared in bold sweeps hither and thither over the level which forms the mountain's base. It is one of the most sublime and most solemn spectacles of God. This mountain, the river, the plain, all open before you in a solitude so profound as to sober you into sadness, and make you feel, especially toward eventide, the spirit of the scene. Beyond the river, sparkling curve, and the mountain, piercing into heaven, you see nothing in the far distance but the last stronghold of the Muscovite—a few checkered lines of cantonments, where he bides his time, ready to spring upon the expiring lion of Persia. As we stood gazing entranced, while lights and shades of every hue flitted in ceaseless play over the lovely mountain, suddenly all was changed. Of all that was dazzling beauty before, nothing remained but the cold ashy outline of the mountain against the sky. The sun sunk to rest, and down flung his twilight shadows, darkening all around. As these deepened over the silent landscape, with true feeling of Eastern insecurity we hastened down into the city for shelter.—Sunday Magazine.

THE VATICAN MANUSCRIPT.—The illustrious Dr. Tischendorf, who has given to the world the ancient manuscript of the New Testament, discovered by himself in a convent of Mount Sinai, made a journey to Rome to obtain from the Pope the authorization of publishing another important manuscript of the Bible, called the Codex Vaticanus. Although he was well received by the Pope, he nevertheless did not receive the desired permission. He had to content himself with the promise that Rome itself would publish it. This promise has not been forgotten; and at the World's Exposition at Paris can now be seen a specimen of this new and important work, sent by the Polyglott Printing Establishment of the Propaganda at Rome. The Monde of Paris speaks of it as follows:

"This contribution consists of two copies—the one paper made by hand for this special purpose at Fabriano, the other on parchment prepared at Rome—of the Gospel of St. Matthew—a part of the reproduction in fac simile of the Greek manuscript of the Bible preserved in the Vatican library. The work of this reproduction has been going on for some time, and not less than five years will be needed to finish the whole. It is by means of type cast expressly for this at Leipzig that the writing of the manuscript is imitated in all its perfection. The entire manuscript is written in the large or uncial letter; but it is evident that a great deal of patient labor is necessary to study the different forms given to each letter in the body of the work. This is not all; the yellowish color of the ink, the red color of the marginal notes, and even the flourishes of the pen of the copyist, are all faithfully reproduced.

"The work is entitled: Bibbion sacrorum græcus Codex Vaticanus aplice Pio IX., Pont. Max. Collatus studiis C. Verellone et J. Cozza editus. The edition will embrace five volumes of three hundred pages each, for the reproduction of the entire text, and one volume of annotations. Only two hundred and fifty copies will be struck off."

LOST LILIES.

BY ALICE CARY.

Where your picture? Here it lies!
 A little, and a lily-like brow;
 And that bright smile, and eyes That are just the soul's sweet overflow.

And your shoulders, softly pale,
 And the radiating play
 Of the light, up out of their veil, And the waves of the May.

And your white as the throat of a swan,
 And the proudly graceful held;
 And the beam "clothed upon As usually," like the lady of old.

And your hair, that dropping down,
 And your glances over bold;
 And the golden gleam in the brown,
 And the gleam in the gleam god.

And your eyes like a splendor fall, And your heart not at my love, I see;
 And your heart not one, and it was not!
 And the angel she was, to me.

And the picture and put it away,
 And the only true misad;
 And the doll, could she dance say And the spirit and if of the life is fled?

And your years, and seven again,
 And the three to the seven—a weary space;
 And the fingers of the rain And the down the daisies over her face.

And your eyes, and three,
 And the shadow that made for me And the shadow my pathway crossed.

And then some meteor gleam And the broken of some ravied dream And the only threat of some ravied dream And the like some into my heart.

And a planet, steady and still,
 And the ever a rainbow, brave and fine;
 And the flowerly head of a hill And the cloud of my life to shile.

And in Love, and this I trust,
 And the run me over and sweet done,
 And the like a safe in the dust,
 And the like in the glow of the great, glad Sun.

And in Love, and this I trust,
 And the run me over and sweet done,
 And the like a safe in the dust,
 And the like in the glow of the great, glad Sun.

 seer at $12, now clearing and building; and I am told I can get from 50 to 500 more on the same terms. I can clear and plant corn land for from $3 to $6 per acre, and make a very good crop without any cultivation, so effectual is the burning of the brush. I can clear old land, once cleared, and after two years abandoned, and make superior pasture of it, for $3 per acre, or put it in corn, rice, or sugar cane, and make more to the hand than in any place I have ever been.

From the letters I have, I think all the land I have to sell will be disposed of before the first of June next, but plenty more can be had of private parties, and much of the Government land will be cheap at $250 per acre, even if they stick to that price. Yours truly, R. B. DUVAL.

PREACHERS IN EPIDEMIC.

The Lavaca Commercial of the 25th ult., in an excellent article, makes, among others, the following just and sensible remarks:

"A very large number of ministers of the gospel have fallen victims to the epidemic which has, for several months, been ravaging our State. This fatality is to be attributed to the fact that the ministers, in their visitations, day and night, to the bedside of the sick and dying, are peculiarly exposed to the disease.

It is characteristic of the ministers of the gospel that, as a class, they are self-sacrificing. No section of country is too sickly for the minister. He takes up his abode where duty calls. The settlement of Texas most exposed to the depredations of the murderous savages, will have among those hardy frontiersmen, the regular visits of the itinerant minister, who after preaching will be ready to join with the most adventurous in a buffalo or Indian hunt. During the war, some of the most heroic acts performed, were by chaplains among the wounded upon the battle-field.

Knowing these facts as we know them, and weeping as we have wept this year over the untimely death of so many brethren and friends, we have very much regretted to see in some of our exchanges, an occasional fling at the minister. Not long since a Waco editor gave us a long diatribe against Protestant preachers, in contrast with the priesthood of the Catholic Church. We have not a word to say against the Catholic priests. Their fidelity to duty is proverbial, and worthy of all honor; but we object to such invidious comparisons. The records of Protestant churches show that their ministers are not wanting in the day of trial. The Waco editor avows himself a Protestant, and we should infer from his article that he would be very generous to the families of Protestant ministers who stood their ground and died at their posts. If so, we can gratify him, by furnishing the names of families of preachers who have died during our present epidemic. He can take his choice as to whom he will assist, either Lutherans, Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, or Methodists.— Will the editor respond?

More Methodist preachers have died during the present epidemic than were present at the first Conference in Texas. Enough Presbyterians have died to organize a Presbytery, and a number belonging to other churches. How are their places to be supplied?

With reference to Methodist ministers, it occurs to us that their peculiar position lessens very materially the obligation which may rest on the preacher to face the perils of an epidemic. The ministers in other denominations are usually established in their pastorate for years and often for life.
 They regard the field of their pastoral labors as their home.— Their sojourn there is, in a great measure, a matter of choice with themselves. With the Methodist preacher it is different. His appointment lasts but one year. He may be changed the next. He has no home. If he stays and has the fever, the next year he may be moved to the mountains. The question whether he should incur the risk when he is merely a so-journeyer, we shall not decide for another man. We know what an epidemic is. We have breathed the fetid air of the sick room, where disease and death were present in all their ghastliness; and, as one of a very small number of those who have escaped, amid the many ministers of Protestant churches who have fallen victims to the yellow fever, we are not prepared to say to any man, who has a wife and children depending upon him: "You are recreant to your duty, should you leave when the scourge appears." If the church assigned men to such a post with the understanding that when acclimated, they would be continued, then the case would be different; but to require men to stay the few months that are allowed them amidst these dangers, and to involve their families in the same risk, is an act that we would prefer that another rather than oneself should perform. The decision should be voluntary on the part of the preacher. Into that family circle where the husband and wife, looking on the helpless ones, around them, debate the question in which life and death are involved, we would not intrude. Obligations the most sacred; feelings the deepest and purest that control human action, may decide the question in the heart of the husband and father.

 Before another passes judgment upon him, let him meet the trial himself.

With reference to the Protestant clergy and Catholic priesthood, there is a still wider difference. The one may have wife and children, whom he has solemnly promised to cherish and protect; the other has not. It is something to ask a man to risk his life; it is more to ask him to bring the sorrows of widowhood and orphanage into his family. If a Protestant minister does remain, with this pressure on his heart, the balance is greatly in his favor.—*Tex-

THE LAY ELEMENT.—We are inclined to think that the entire success of the re-organization of the Lay element into the deliberative bodies of our Church depends upon the estimate that the Lay delegates place upon the privilege and duty resting upon them by virtue of their new relation.

We entertain high hopes of the success of the Lay element. Those Lay members who attended our late Conference, took a deep interest, attended to the various duties assigned them, on the different Committees, etc., and did their work well. Can we prevail on our Lay delegates to believe that it is then duty to attend every session of the Conference? May we be permitted to say that the performance of duty is not left to our own option—a question of privilege may be—but a question of duty is not. If our Lay delegates are judiciously selected, and will go forth promptly in the discharge of their high duties, it will be a grand success.—Christian Observer.

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.—A contemporary publishes the important fact, that the revivals reported in the Richmond Episcopal Methodist, the Richmond Southern, New Orleans Advocate, and St. Louis Christian Advocate took on fourteen hundred accessions to the M. E. Church, South, in a single week! This doesn't look much like being "absorbed or annihilated." "What shall we say to these things? If that be for us, who can be against us?" From the testimony of two of the first evangelists on this continent, Bishops Pierce and Marvin, Southern Metho-distism was never more compact, better organized and efficient than it is at the present time. We have only to attend to our proper work, and to continue to preach Christ—"preach Christ—with a clean heart and a firm reliance upon the God of our fathers, and success everywhere is certain." "Now thanks be unto God who always causeth us to triumph in Christ and maketh manifest the favor of his knowledge by us in every place."—Episcopal Methodist.

A negro man, Ephe, who was a regular attendant at church, was a friend of his Bible-learnings. He was sawing wood one day, while his master's son, a lad of about twelve years, was looking on, and now and then asked questions.
 "Which of the apostles do you like best?" asked Ephe. "Well, I don't know," drawled the boy. "I like Sampson," said Ephe; "he was so strong, and piled up dem wicked folks so." "Why, Ephe," replied the boy, "Sampson wasn't one of the apostles." Ephe put down his saw, and looked at the youngster a moment in amazement, and then asked him with an air of triumph: "Look here, white boy, how old am you?"
 "Twelve," replied the boy. "Well, I'm forty; now you ought to know best, I ax you dat?"

Extract from a Letter of Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio.

LANCASTER, OHIO, Oct. 28, 1867.

To the Editor of the Commercial:

My opinion is often asked as to the cause of the Republican losses at the late election, especially in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and the best means to relieve our country from its unhappy complication, and restore harmony and union. I am always prompt and free to give my opinion on political questions, and choose, now, to give it through your widely circulated paper.

By publishing the above you will oblige your obedient servant, T. EWING.

 AT THE RECENT ELECTION.

I am well satisfied with the results of our election—we may consider it a tie—the one hundred thousand majority which, when we were altogether a union war party elected through our Governor has been driven off by a few Radical leaders, whom the Republicans in the two Houses have allowed to rule and perhaps to ruin them. There is a very large number of additional Whigs, and those who inherit their prepossessions and opinions, who went with the Republicans at the late election in all things except the constitutional amendment, because they feared to place power in the hands of their old adversaries, the Democrats, while they heartily disapproved the extreme Radical policy of the Republican party. This class of voters very nearly numbered in the difference between the Democratic vote for Governor and the vote against the constitutional amendment. On the whole, the result has shown that if a new election were to take place at once, it would be in the power of the Conservatives to give a large majority to either side at pleasure. It is a day, or may not be, the case a year to come—either party when in power may, within that time, possibly destroy itself past the possibility of rescue. The present injury of the Conservatives is commune with the Republican party, it that party with, in obedience to what they now know to be the will of the people, recall their proscrip-tive mandate, and leave the medication of the Southern States free to act in modifying and carrying on their State Governments, and desist from forcing on them negro suffrage and quasi-negro quasi-civil rule. This they will do if they lead aright, and profit by the lesson which has just been taught them.

The two propositions, namely—of giving suffrage to blacks, and denying it to the whites as a penalty for past political and military offences—were for the first time submitted to the people, and their opinions asked upon them at the late election in Ohio.

Ohio was selected as the most decidedly Radical among the great States, and the question was put to her people, first of all, in the confident expectation that their authority would be obtained for fastening the reconstruction on the South, and extending them over the Border States, under the assumption that the government of no State can be republican that does not admit negro suffrage and proscribes men who have been rebels. Both these questions were involved and discussed in the Ohio election; the Republican orators insisting that it would be inconsistent and unjust to force negro suffrage on the South and not accept it for ourselves. This was manifestly true; we could not, with any pretence of political justice, place the whole South under negro government, by admitting all black and excluding so many white voters as would give the negroes a majority everywhere, and at the same time refuse to suffer 7000 negroes to vote in Ohio, with 500,000 white voters to control them: When the people of Ohio refused to accept negro suffrage as a part of their own system, they were guilty of no inconsistency and no injustice —they had in fact neither proscription nor negro suffrage on the South—as far as it had been exercised it was the act of their public enemies, and they, by this vote, refused their sanction. This was the response of the forty thousand majority who voted against the constitutional amendment. They disapprove proscription for past political or military offences, and they disapprove of the attempt to force negro suffrage upon an unwilling people.

I have no doubt a large majority of the Republicans in the two Houses of Congress are conservative in their opinions and feelings; that, as a matter of choice, they would prefer, for themselves and their neighbors, white to negro rulers, and would rather soothe and heal the wounds of the Union than to aggravate and inflame them.
 Fortunately for them and for the nation, the Ohio election has shown before it was too late, that it will consist with the will of the people to act in accordance with such feelings and convictions. I therefore most earnestly hope that the Conservative Republicans of Congress will de-throne their despotic leaders, keep out of those pens of political bondage called Congressional caucuses, and take control of the two Houses; for they can do it readily, if each and all will but keep themselves free to vote and act according to their convictions, and thus represent each his district, instead of all representing a cancun. And they should at once rescind all measures which operate as mere insult and annoyance to intelligent men of the South; give over the effort to establish negro government by the disfranchisement of the whites; repeal their ordinances placing the Southern States under military government, and make the military there again subordinate to the civil power, and replace it where the Constitution places it; under the control of the Executive —admit at once the loyal and legally qualified Senators and Representatives from the ten excluded States, not making party adhesion a test of either qualification or loyalty. They will then have the aid and counsel of the wisest and best men of those States, and reconstruction will be possible, and, in time, effected. There will still be, for a while, disturbance, riots, crimes of violence, and perhaps local insurrections for the public mind which tended to settle down in peace after the close of the war, and under the President's plan of restoration, has been again greatly agitated, and unhappily the men most interested in re-establishing order, the men of intelligence, men of property, men who, by their position in society, had influence over the ignorant and increasing masses, are placed under the ban of the Union, and thus rendered powerless—and all is left in the hands of a disorderly multitude, except in so far as they are restrained by military force. There never can be permanent reconstruction until the intelligence of those States is released from political bondage. When the ban is removed, they may soon regain their influence and render efficient aid in the restoration of order and domestic quiet and peace; and there is no danger of their again exciting or countenancing secession—the terrible calamities which it has brought upon them will be an endoring monition against it, and nothing but actual and persistent oppression will again drive them to revolt.

By retracing their steps which have been obviously taken in a wrong direction—by an honest effort to restore party supremacy—by following promptly and cheerfully, the late indications of the public will, the Republican party may deserve and secure the confidence of political power; and they can secure it by no other means. Demagogues can now avail nothing. Our republican institutions are endangered—the people wish them preserved—and consummation of an Executive, stripped of all power to do good or evil, does not tend to restore or preserve them.
 It is idle to denounce the President as a usurper, because he refused to sanction a series of bills giving him unconstitutional power, and stripping him of power which the Constitution gives him. Partisan press may join in a crusade against him; the people will not, but rather look to his acts and the acts of Congress, and weigh them against each other. The public mind is prepared for a calm comparison, the temper in which each was conceived, and the effects that each has produced, and is producing, on the country its prosperity and peace.

The President also disapproves of the reconstruction acts, now in process of being forced upon the Southern States—and I concur with him.
 The measure strikes me as neither wise nor just. Admit that the rebels are treated in it with mercy; that they all deserve death as a punishment for their treason, without regard to the means by which they came or were forced into it; that instead, they are merely placed in political bondage, under their former slaves. Still the punishment is arbitrary and unlawful; it has no constitutional warrant, and no one is bound to submit to it any longer than constrained by actual force—and it is not likely to conciliate the kindly feelings of the men of the South whom it proscribes and places in subjection. The measure, as I view it, is unwise and unlawful as to them, and unjust and degrading to us of the North who never rebelled. Carry it into effect, and it gives to the plantation negro of the South a large excess of power in the Government of the Union over that enjoyed by one of our Northern citizens. For example, the proscription of the whites given to the negroes in Louisiana, efficiently, the power of the State in the local, and also in the general Government, and the State is to have power in the Union due to its whole population, white and black. The census of 1860 gives Louisiana an aggregate population of 708,000, composed of 357,000 whites, and 351,000 blacks.

 The State, therefore, will be entitled, under the reconstruction restrictions, to seven representatives in Congress, of which 351,000 blacks will be the whole efficient constituency—the white men who can read and write and cipher as far as to the rule of three, having no more to do with it than their mules and horses. So that 50,000 manumitted slaves send a member to Congress, and 100,000 citizens of Ohio do the same thing, and no more.— One manumitted plantation negro in Louisiana will, therefore, have power in the House of Representatives equal to two citizens of Ohio, and the preponderance will be considerably greater, in the electoral college, for President. The 351,000 Louisiana negroes will be entitled to two Senators—2,300,000 citizens of Ohio are entitled to two. One Louisiana negro will, therefore, have political power in the Senate more than equal to six of our citizens.
 To prove the reconstruction scheme a wrong against us, citizens of a Northern State, who never rebelled, it were only necessary to show that one of us, a citizen of Ohio, is as good as a manumitted plantation negro of Louisiana, and ought to have a voice as potent in the general government of the Union.

The Constitution, as it is, involves inequalities in this particular among the citizens of the different States, and I would amend it to remove them; it works no mischief, for we are all one people, of the same race, of like intelligence, in all things alike, morally and socially. But I would not amend the Constitution to increase it where it exists, or to create it where it exists not; and, especially, I would not give this enormous excess of power to men of a different race, who are not and can never be our associates; of whom we know little socially, except that they are ignorant and degraded, and nothing politically, except that they have been, and are a disturbing element in our system.
 Their degradation, ignorance, and immorality, the bitter fruits of slavery and oppression, entitle them to our commiseration, but do not entitle them to a place so much above us in the scale of political power.
 It would be a much smaller concession by us to the African, and more reasonable and just, to give each negro in Ohio ten votes, than to give the negro in the South the power over us, in the Union, involved in this plan of reconstruction. It may be said, and truly, that this inequality will be but temporary; that but one generation of proscribed white men have to die off, and all will be right; a white man in the North will at length become equal to a negro in the South. This is true; even less than the truth; it is impossible that these proposed negro republics shall, by their own action, ever come into being; or, if created by external power, shall stand alone for a single moment. There will be no attempt to carry them out, or any pretence of the kind, beyond the next Presidential election. In the meantime, there will be war to the knife of black against white; of barbarism and poverty and power combined against intelligence and property, which can be restrained only by military power; and the United States will be compelled to keep up standing armies in all the reconstructed States until they shall be again reconstructed. During this process, the five brigadier generals will not only be autocrats each of his district, but will control the vote of the nine States, and send to the Senate eighteen Senators, to the House eighty-two members, and give the electoral college one hundred votes for President. This will be better than the proposed negro supremacy, as our military officers are generally humane and intelligent men and know how to govern, but it were not well to invest even them with such exorbitant powers.

But to look further to consequences. If there shall be a majority of constitutional votes for one candidate for the Presidency, and if the one hundred military electors, added to the minority, make a majority of the whole, there will arise a question which can be decided only by the sword; and the army of the South, if united under the live generals, will settle the question of legitimacy at Washington, as the Prætorian guard were wont to do at Rome, and the Janissaries at Constantinople.

The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

RENEW.

The preacher is on his last round. See him before he leaves for Conference, and pay for the coming year. It will save much writing and much grumbling—with the mails.

CHANGED BACK.

The time of holding the Mississippi Conference, is to be December the 4th, at Natchez—and not the 11th, as stated heretofore.

So the time of holding the Louisiana Conference, will be the 11th of December, at New Orleans—and not the 18th.

We have just received a letter from the Rev. W. E. M. Linfield, which says: "A letter from the Bishop, dated the 11th inst., confirms his dispatch to me, dated the 2d inst. Both say the Mississippi Conference will meet on the 4th of December, and both that the Louisiana Conference is unchanged." The note received by us from Bishop Paine was without date, as published in our last number; this coming after his dispatch led to the conclusion that the note stated his latest conclusion. From observations we think that the practice of changing the time or place of holding a Conference is attended with more evil than good, and we hope that hereafter our Bishops will not listen to such recommendations.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.—If our readers will turn to page 5, they will see a very generous advertisement sent in from our friend, D. Tillotson, Merchant Manufacturer of Boots and Shoes, No. 18 Camp street, under the City Hotel. We say a good deal when we say that all the shoes at 'our house' are bought at this establishment, for we not only need a good article there, but a good deal of it. For a number of years Mr. T. has been in this business in this city, and now makes at his own factory, at Hammond Station, a Lady's or Gentleman's Shoe that will compare favorably, with the best Philadelphia Manufacture.

AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.—A planter writes to the New Orleans Times from Union Church, Miss., stating that a discovery has been made in that place which may be of the highest importance to our planting interest. It is no less than that the cotton fly deposits his eggs in the green limbs of the cotton stalk at the close of the season. The fly penetrates to the centre of the stock and lays the eggs in its pith. If this be true—and we have no reason to doubt it—would not the worm be destroyed if the cotton stalks were buried in a shallow trench?

The last words of the sweetest voice that ever spake on earth, were those which gave to the Church in charge all nations; that they might receive the gift of God, and that the inheritance of the Son might be secured to him, 'from the river to the ends of the earth.' It was indeed due to all human kind, and to every creature, that the glorious Presence should not be confined to the mere handful of beings who at that time inhabited Judea; and the Saviour, recognizing this claim of all men upon him, as a universal blessing, was not willing to leave the earth until he had arranged for its satisfaction. As if this pressed more immediately upon his mind than any other care, he reserved it for the latest moment of his stay, thereby giving it a place equal in importance to that first angelic announcement of his birth. This last word, and that first one, are in substance the same: 'this is but a continuance of that glad note which those heralds uttered; the one promised to the whole earth, that which the other bequeaths—'good will.' This was indeed the great interest, to convey to every man the boundless good which Heaven had provided for him. To have left earth without securing it, would have left the mission of the Son fatally incomplete. He might have employed a superior race to follow up the victory of his death, to diffuse the light of his rising, and to apply the laws of grace and truth which he had established. It is a wonder he did not. The angels were doubtless more than ready to undertake the noble mission, and possibly expected this high honor of the Divine Son; having accompanied him, and discharged, it may be, some important services when the world was created. Employed so often in directing the fortunes of Israel, they looked forward wistfully to the time when an angel might be seen flying under every sky 'having the everlasting gospel to preach.'

But the Saviour determined otherwise; he reserved this mark of favor for the Church which he had bought with his own blood. He placed this, His signet, on her hand, and this royal crown upon her brow, this broad seal authenticating her as his elect forever; He gave into her hand the key which opened the gates of light, and then the gates of heaven—the keys of the kingdom. To her alone was confided the Gospel, the most precious gift from Christ to man. This confidence of her Lord is her brightest glory. From henceforth this was to be her characteristic—a winged trumpet. There was to be no halting, no weariness; hills, vales, rivers, seas, oceans, languages, climes, obstacles, and perils of all kinds were to be overcome; the law henceforth, was motion, action, aggression—the whole world must be reached. Every apostle and evangelist, and every 'angel' of every Church was to go forth to flood every people and fill every heart with the glorious gospel of the Son of God, as if they were so many angels appointed to undo the bars of the first morning, and let out the light upon each world and so make it forever a star. There could be no weariness in such an employment; every messenger would derive fresh inspiration from the glories which would spring forth at his approach, and kindle upon his path. But far more imposing was the mission of the Church than that of distributing natural light; and to repress the gospel, or hold it back from any people, would be a greater calamity and marring of God's creation than to leave myriads of stars unlighted.

If those nations who have not yet received the gospel, only now knew of what they were debarred, it would enkindle in them a fire of indignation against those who have it, and keep it back, fiercer than the accusations of Sodom in the day of judgment. There are thousands of our people who do not care to meet this dread accountability in the way in which our Church is providing for it. They feel the weight of Christ's command 'go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature,' as pressing upon them. They do not feel that one branch of the Church can discharge this obligation for another. They cannot see that any amount of home-preaching can be considered as a sufficient set-off against the neglect of the heathen. To move mountains by faith, and yet be without this 'charity' i. e., this love of our neighbor, will profit them nothing. And they cannot accept, and will not, the halting, disorganized, half-hearted movement called the Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, as an expression of either, the piety, the energy, or the wishes of our Church in regard to foreign missions. What have we to show for twenty four years of our separate existence in the way of sending forth the gospel to 'every creature'? We have three or four missionaries in China—China, that holds a third of the human family—China, to whom by right belongs one-third of the Redeemer's blood, and one-third of his life. Yet two thousand years have gone by; and while we have inherited so much of all those centuries that we were, and are, one of the most powerful branches of Christ's Church, of what share of all that was left them by the Saviour, have those Chinese come into the actual possession. We have not helped them to a single Church, scarcely to a school house. Their language we find opened to our hand; the way to their chief cities prepared politically; and the Chinese mind ready to receive the graft of life immortal. The little we have done there has yielded an hundred fold; God has blessed the men we have sent out; China-men of rarest gifts and culture, and of the noblest mould, have been converted by their preachings. The Rev. Mr. Cunningham, who had been working in that field, said on the floor of the last General Conference:

"If I am at all capable of judging of the success attending the labors of Christian brethren at home, I do most emphatically declare the China Mission a success. I believe that if every foreign missionary was withdrawn from there, it would live, as had been the case in Madagascar. I believe that we have men and women that would die for Christ, and die willingly and gladly. Some of them have been arraigned by the Government, and brought before the authorities, and threatened with instant death, unless they would retract; and not one gave evidence of an unwillingness to sacrifice his life for the cause of Jesus."

Upon one of the native converts of this mission, he pronounced the following eulogium:

"Our native preacher, LIEU SEEN SANG, whom it pleased God to take to himself the past year, was a man of no ordinary capacity, and a most sincere and earnest Christian minister. He did much for the cause of Christ during a ministry of fifteen years. There is no one in that field who can take his place—not one who can lift his battle axe or bend his bow. As a preacher he was clear, fluent and forcible. With an oriental imagination and a heart all on fire, but few in any country surpassed him as an effective preacher. Not only the native Church in China, but the cause of Protestant missions generally has suffered a great loss in his death."

Yet with all this, and much more that might be cited, our mission there is paralyzed by a paltry debt of four or five thousand dollars—a debt incurred by our missionaries during the war, when cut off entirely from us, and while they in great part supported themselves by their own labor. Other Churches number their missionaries and teachers in foreign fields by the score, we have not ten in all.

It is not our business to trace this responsibility, and to fix this failure where it belongs—whether in the General Conference, the Superintendents, the Annual Conferences, the Missionary Board, the members of the Church, or all together; but it is somewhere, and we ought to find out where it is before the day of judgment. Twenty years is too long to be going on at this easy rate, when we are entrusted with a Gospel for a world.

The exhibition of the first bar of American tin at the St. Louis Fair has had the effect of increasing public confidence in the Missouri mines. Owners of land are not disposed to sell on large advance over their purchase price. Mining operations are progressing, though slowly, and large furnaces are being completed and will be running as soon as possible.

"MADISON COUNTY."

We publish an excellent article from the Rev. H. H. Montgomery, on the religious history of this wealthy region of Mississippi. It was suggested by "Giles County." As the doings of these counties will be ransacked in the great day, it is well that we, beforehand, make some estimate of what they have done, in order to arrive at what they have left undone. The sins of whole sections of country are like those of an individual, mainly sins of omission. We thank God for every preacher sent out, and every camp-meeting held, and every school established; but we never hear the word 'Madison County' without sighing over the immeasurable wealth that Methodism once had there, not consecrated to God, that, now like cloud-scenery is gone, forever gone! Let us learn a lesson, and in the future 'use this world as not abusing it.' Meanwhile what have other counties done?

GREAT NEWS FROM OUR SOUTHERN WORK.—I have just been reading a private letter from Bishop Clark, written immediately after closing the sessions of the Georgia and Alabama Conferences. Both of the Conference sessions were a grand success. Much opposition had been shown some of the preachers, but the blessing of God had rested upon the work. Since November, 1864, the Bishop had organized the Tennessee, Holston, Georgia and Alabama Conferences, and the statistical returns now show an aggregate membership of over forty-eight thousand, and over two hundred traveling preachers. These are, indeed, great figures, and speak most encouragingly of our work in that portion of the South. Bishop Clark pays a high tribute to the self-sacrificing, faithful labors of the preachers.—Northern Christian Advocate.

We wonder what proportion of this forty-eight thousand are white persons; are not the greater part colored people who have been members of the M. E. Church? And the "two hundred traveling Preachers" who are so self-sacrificing, are they not far the most part black men who are getting forth their services, from the Northern Methodist Missionary funds, more money than they ever handled before?

GENERAL NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 18.—Colfax has arrived.

An evening paper reports a caucus of the leading Democrats here, who, after several hours consultation, and settled upon James B. Steedman and John Quincy Adams as candidates for President and Vice President.

The Judiciary Committee have resumed the impeachment testimony. HAVANA, Nov. 20.—A hurricane swept over St. Domingo, October 30th, lasting four hours, desolating the capital, destroying two hundred lives and causing the loss of nearly all the shipping in the harbor. County meetings are being called to elect delegates to the Conservative Convention, which meets in Macon on the 5th of December.

MONTGOMERY, Nov. 20.—In the night session of the Reconstruction Convention, after a protracted contest, the third clause of section 21 of the article on franchise, which disfranchises all who do not vote on the new constitution, was stricken out by a vote of 53 to 32, and the article was postponed, but final vote deferred until to-morrow.

CHARLESTON, Nov. 20.—The election to-day is passing off perfectly quiet. The voting is confined entirely to negroes. Accounts from the inferior Districts represent the whites as everywhere declining to participate in the election.

RALEIGH, N. C., Nov. 20.—The election went off very orderly to-day. The whites voted heavily and almost unanimously the Conservative ticket. Many voted against convention, but over 300 whites who were registered refused to vote at all. About 1,000 votes were cast to-day, making 2,000 for two days. Ballots not yet counted, but it is thought the negroes have carried the city by about 250 majority.

WILMINGTON, Nov. 20.—The election passed off quietly. Great apathy exists among the whites, while the negroes have polled their full strength. Not a black is known to have voted the Conservative ticket. Very few white Radicals vote in this city. The vote in three wards of this city stands: Radicals 843, Conservatives 400. The total registered voters were: whites 905, blacks 1,583. The county will probably give 1,500 Radical majority.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT AT LOCKLAND.—The particulars of the accident at Lockland, Ohio, yesterday represent the scene as horrible in the extreme. The crash was terrible, the cars of the passenger train being all jammed into each other.

The ladies in the sleeping car were crushed between the timbers, one having her head taken completely off, and another her entrails torn out. The names of the killed are Harriet, Rebecca, Sarah and Elizabeth Morgan, of New Orleans, and Charles Jackson, of Boston.

Mr. Jackson lost his life in endeavoring to save the ladies. Mr. Brewer, engineer of the train, was badly burned in attempting to rescue the sisters Morgan.

The entire train was burned, but the baggage and express matter was saved.

GEO. L. HARTSUFF, A. A. G.

Official: NATANIEL BURBANK, 2d Lieutenant 37th Infantry, Brevet 1st Lieut. U. S. A., Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

The following special order speaks for itself:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DIST., New Orleans, La., Nov. 20, 1867. Special Orders No. 191.

By command of Brevet Major Gen. Joseph A. Mower.

NATANIEL BURBANK, 2d Lieut. U. S. Army, A. A. G. Official: NATANIEL BURBANK, 2d Lieut. 37th Infy, Bvt. 1st Lieut. U. S. Army, A. A. G.

On this order the N. O. Times remarks.

"We have elsewhere referred in general terms to the remarkable doings of Gen. Mower. His removal of gentlemen who have been elected to offices of trust, under the bald pretense that they are 'impediments to reconstruction,' will be received as another evidence of his utter disregard of public opinion, and of his willingness to sink the soldier in the partisan. The stranger and place-hunter, J. P. Boyd, is thrust into the judicial seat of Paul E. Theard; the courteous R. C. Bond is exchanged for the brother-in-law of R. King Cutler; H. C. Caulkins, whom nobody knows, takes the place of Wm. Woelker; Eugene Staes, the standing candidate who finds it so difficult to get elected, has jumped into the shoes of Paul W. Gollens; John B. Carter the radical pedagogue, crowded out that prince of good fellows, Dan C. Byerly, and the pretensions John L. Davies, without saying 'by your leave,' walks into the office of Thomas Askew. All this may seem very nice to the tribe of mendacious loyalists, but every decent man in the community will regard it as an outrage."

THE ORDERS OF GEN. MOWER. PENDING.—The following interesting and important dispatch comes from the President's private secretary. It gives assurance that the conduct of Brig. Gen. Mower will no longer be tolerated, and that his recent orders have been suspended by virtue of instructions from Gen. Grant. This will be most gratifying intelligence to the people of this city and State.—N. O. Evening Times, 22d.

FOREIGN NEWS.

NAPOLEON'S SPEECH.

PARIS, Nov. 20.—The following from Napoleon's speech: The necessity of resuming the discussion of important laws has obliged me to call you together unusually early. In view of recent events, I desire to avail myself of your sagacity and assistance. Vague disquietudes have arisen affecting the public mind of Europe, restricting industry and commerce in all quarters.

This uncertainty could endure no longer. It is necessary to accept frankly the changes on the other side of the Rhine, and to proclaim that so long as our interests and dignity shall not be threatened, we will not interfere in the transformations effected by the march of populations.

The disquiet displayed is difficult of explanation; when France has offered the whole world the most imposing spectacle of conciliation and peace. The Universal Exhibition has drawn closer the ties of fraternity between all nations. The Exhibition has disappeared, but its traces will leave a deep impression upon our age. It has destroyed a host of prejudices and errors.

But these pledges of concord do not allow us to dispense with improving the military institutions of France. Our weapons are the sword and navy. The stronger we are the more certain will be the assurance of peace.

I have again been compelled to send our troops to Rome to protect the Holy See from republican invaders, but our conduct could not partake of anything hostile to the independence of Italy, and that nation now understands the danger these revolutionary manifestations have caused to monarchical principles and European order.

Calm re-established in the Papal States, we may calculate the time when our troops can be recalled. For France, the Convention of September, 1815, exists until it is placed.

The relations of Italy to the Holy See interest the whole world; to settle these relations and prevent new complications a conference of the Powers of Europe is proposed.

Referring to the Eastern question I am happy to announce that the powers have agreed upon two principal points. The maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and the amelioration of the condition of the Christians.

The journey I have made with the Empress to the east and north of France has afforded opportunities for manifestations of sympathy which touched me profoundly. I have found that nothing has been able to shake the confidence the people have placed in me and their attachment to my dynasty. For my part I labor incessantly to anticipate their wishes.

The harvest has not been good, and foreign trade can alone secure supplies and low prices.

I foresee the period when a reduction of taxes may be taken into consideration.

Alluding to reforms already established, and others proposed, he says:

Doubtless the introduction of new liberties has exposed the public mind to excitement and dangerous impulses, but to render them powerless, I count upon the common sense of the country, the progress of public morality and the firmness of the ruling power in their suppression.

Let us, then, follow the work we have undertaken together to develop liberal institutions without weakening the principle of authority. Let us not cease to spread around us the comforts of life, and adopt every measure which will render prosperous the social condition of the great masses.

For my own part, you may rest assured that I will uphold firmly the power conferred upon me; for no obstacle nor unjust opposition will shake either my courage or my faith in the future.

A Wonderful Flower

Dr. F. N. Otis, in a work called the Isthmus of Panama and its Connections, gives the following description of a wonderful and singularly beautiful flower, found on the line of the Panama railroad, in the vicinity of Lion Hill station:

"Along this section is found that rare variety of the Orchid family, the Peristera elata, known as the 'Espirito Santo.' Its blossom, of alabaster whiteness, approaches the tulip in form, and gives forth a powerful perfume not unlike that of the magnolia; but it is neither for its beauty of shape, its purity of color, nor its fragrance, that it is chiefly esteemed. Resting within the cup of the flower so marvellously formed that no human skill, be it never so cunning, could excel the resemblance, lies the prone image of a dove. Its exquisitely moulded pinions hang lifeless from its sides. The head bends gently forward. The tiny bill, tipped with a delicate carmine, almost touches its snow-white breast while the expression of the entire image (and it requires no stretch of the imagination to see the expression) seems the very incarnation of meekness and ethereal innocence. No one who has seen it, can wonder that the early Spanish Catholics, ever on the alert for some phenomenon upon which to fasten the idea of a miraculous origin, should have bowed down before this matchless flower, and named it 'Flor del Espirito Santo,' or 'the Flower of the Holy Ghost,' nor that the still more superstitious Indian should have accepted the imposing title, and ever have gazed upon it with awe and devotional reverence, ascribing a peculiar sanctity even to the ground upon which it blossoms, and to the very air which it laden with its delicious fragrance."

"It is found most frequently in low and marshy grounds, springing from decayed logs, and crevices in the rocks. Some of the most vigorous plants attain a height of six or seven feet; the leaf-stalks are jointed, and throw out broad lanceolate leaves by pairs; the flower-stalks spring from the bulb, and are wholly destitute of leaves, often bearing a cluster of a dozen or fifteen flowers. It is an annual, blooming in July, August and September, and has in several instances been cultivated in the conservatories of foreign lands. In former times, bulbs of the plant could rarely be obtained, and then only with much labor and difficulty; but since their localities have become familiar to the less reverential Anglo-Saxon, great numbers have been gathered and distributed throughout different parts of the world, though their habits and necessities have been so little appreciated that efforts to bring them to flower usually prove ineffectual; if, however, they are procured in May or June, after the flower-stalk has started, when sufficient appropriate nutriment resides in the bulb to develop the perfect flowers, they can be safely transplanted, and will flower under the ordinary treatment adapted to the bulbous plants of colder climates. The bulbs, dried or growing, may be procured either at Aspinwall, or Panama, at from two to five dollars per dozen."

IN MEMORIAM.

On Friday evening, the 1st inst., as the sun was casting his long shadows, my precious mother, MARY CLARE KEENER, was laid in the silent grave by the side of dear father, in the Greenmount Cemetery at Baltimore. Her brown hair still retained its youthful color, all trace of suffering had passed away from her face, and her features, always regular and pleasant, were beautifully composed in that last long sleep.

She had come down gradually to death during the past twelve months; but immediately before dying was in much pain, and prayed, 'O Heavenly Father, release me—precious Saviour, take, oh take me'; and then, as the stream of her soul ran in the dark channel, she murmured, 'a crown of glory! Oa her birth-day, the 31st, of October, she thought herself dying, and asked for a drink. "We gave her," writes my brother, "a cup of cream of which she drank heartily, and handing back the cup, said, 'oh! how good the Lord has been to me! I feel grateful to Him for all that he has done for me, my precious Saviour! oh, my dear children, He has been very good to me—my precious Saviour!'" I said, mother, you are just seventy years old to-day. "Yes," she replied, "the Lord has been so good to me so many years." Sophy said, mother, do you think you are dying? "Yes, my dear, give my love to John, and all the children." Her last words were, "we have the peace of God, Mary."

My mother was the eldest daughter of John Brice, and was a native of Annapolis Maryland. She was converted in her fifteenth year, under the preaching of Joseph Fry. Her father professed religion in his nineteenth year, (1789), under the ministry of the Rev. Ezekiel Cooper; and her mother, Sarah Lane, was converted several years later under the same preacher. Both were decided Methodists, and entertained Philip Bruce, William Barke, and the preachers of that day, with abundant hospitality. This example moulded my dear mother; she too entertained many angels during her life. And as far back as I can remember she fed the poor, and was an active, constant friend of the widow and orphan. As a Methodist she was unwavering, and always maintained in her dress the original plainness of her Church. One of my earliest church-going recollections is that of sitting beside her in Light Street, laying my head on her lap, and kissing her hand during a love-feast.

In 1818 she became the wife of Christian Keener, my father; of whose diligence in life, simplicity and fervor in the service of God, and steadfastness in the faith of Christ, I cannot speak adequately. He died seven years ago in his sixty-third year. They both lived to see seven, of eight children grown, and all members of the Church.

It is impossible for us to grieve after our dear mother; for as she must needs go, we know that she has accomplished the triumph of a peaceful and holy life, and that she is now among the living—He that keepeth my sayings shall never see death. And it is to us the highest honor to have been the children of our dear parents, and the richest blessing we could possibly have received from our Heavenly Father. To live useful and happy lives, and die in full view of Heaven as they have, is indeed our utmost aim.

[Extract.]

1. In accordance with the written agreement made and entered into between the Acting General Superintendent of Educational Department, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, and the Board of Directors of Public Schools in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, the Educational Department will, on this day, turn over to the owners or lessors, all buildings leased for the use of Schools and the lands under the auspices of this Bureau for the children of freed people.

All Schools under the supervision of this Bureau within the limits of this city, together with the Teachers in charge of the same, (provided they are desirous of remaining in their present capacity), are hereby transferred to the Directors of Public Schools in charge of the Board of Directors of Public Schools.

First Lieutenant J. M. Leo, Acting General Superintendent of Education for this Bureau, is charged with the execution of this order.

The Schools for freed children have heretofore been conducted upon the tuition system, and necessarily excluded many whose parents were unable to pay the teachers. Under the present arrangement the benefits of Free Schools are secured to all freed children in this city, and it is hoped that this measure, perfected in furtherance of the educational interests of this class, will be accepted and carried out in good faith by all parties concerned.

The freed people are earnestly invited to avail themselves of the advantages of the Public Schools, which offer to them the opportunity of procuring for their children a good and true education.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A REPOSITORY OF

Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

HARPER'S BAZAR, the publication of which has just been commenced by HARPER & BROTHERS, is an illustrated Weekly Journal, devoted to Fashion and Household Literature.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. By arrangements which the Publishers have perfected, at great cost, with the most celebrated European Fashion Journals—particularly with the well-known Bazar of Berlin—illustrations of Fashions for each week of the year will appear in publication in Paris and Berlin in advance of which will follow exclusively in this Journal.

In a country where Three Hundred Millions of Dollars are annually expended for dry-goods, and where the taste and the fashion of the most tasteful and economical methods of fashioning these articles become of the greatest value to American women. The BAZAR will contain full and explicit instructions, with illustrations, which will enable every Lady Reader to cut and make her own, and her children's entire wardrobe with a large portion of her husband's. Each alternate Number will be accompanied with large Pattern Plates, containing from forty to fifty full-sized Patterns, applicable to every article of wardrobe made in the family, with the necessary Directions for cutting and making. Similar Illustrations and Descriptions of Fancy Work will also be furnished. These Patterns will be executed in Paris and Berlin, and will serve as a guide of the kind hitherto produced in this country. Frequently an elegant Colored Fashion Plate will be presented with the paper. Practical Descriptions will also be given of the Fashions especially in vogue in New York—the centre of Fashion in America.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Science, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns. In the first Number of the BAZAR will be commenced a Novel, entitled "The Good and the Bad," or "The Brand in My Story," by James De Mille, Esq., Author of "The Dodge Club," several of our most competent critics, who unanimously pronounce it, in point of interest, plot, variety of adventure, and graphic delineation of character, to be fully equal to any of the novels of Wilkie Collins.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine colored paper, and will be published weekly, at ten cents per single Number, or Four Dollars per Year.

Postage, Five Cents for Three Months. Single Subscribers will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of Four Dollars.

An Extra Copy will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers, at Four Dollars each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for Twenty Dollars.

THE HOME MONTHLY, New Orleans, for 1867.

The HOME MONTHLY will contain forty-eight pages of reading matter, printed upon fine paper and in clear type, and will, from time to time, be accompanied by elegant steel-plate engravings. The subscription price will remain $3.00 per annum, or $1.50 for six months, invariably in advance. In order to build up a still larger circulation, we have concluded to offer the following:

Liberal Inducements to Agents.

To any person sending us three yearly subscriptions, with nine dollars, we will send the MONTHLY six months, or allow them, if they prefer, to retain One Dollar and Twenty-five Cents of the amount.

To any person sending us six subscriptions, with eighteen dollars, ($18), we will send the MONTHLY one year, or allow them to retain Two Dollars and Fifty Cents of the amount.

On amounts for subscription less than nine dollars, agents will be allowed to retain ten per cent.

Ministers, it is hoped, will act as agents, not so much from pecuniary considerations as from a laudable desire to assist in building up a literature worthy of a place among the families of the South, and on the center-tables of Christian people.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

Our leading staple has been in active demand but at steadily declining prices, which have been depressed by unfavorable accounts from New York and Liverpool. With this exception the market has been extremely dull, there having been very little movement in any branch of trade. The receipts of Sugar and Molasses have continued moderate, and met a ready sale at full prices, particularly for the latter. Very little has been done in Tobacco, and operations in Western Produce have been of limited extent, without any material variations in quotations. With regard to the general wholesale trade, we have but little improvement to notice. Very few country merchants have made their appearance, and the purchases of those who have visited the city have been on a very moderate scale. Our principal thoroughfares, nevertheless, present a much more lively appearance, but it is mostly from the return of our own citizens who have spent the summer abroad.

COTTON.—We stated in our last report that the market closed at 16c for Good Ordinary, 16½c for Low Middling, 17½c for Middling and 18 to — for Strict Middling, but with manifest indications of increased weakness, although the demand had been quite active and the sale on a liberal scale. On Saturday it opened under the depression caused by some orders having been countermanded, and the limits on others reduced, but at a later hour, as factors met the demand freely at slight concessions, the demand became more lively, and 2650 bales changed hands at prices showing increased irregularity, but on the whole, a falling off of ¼ to ½c. Low Middling being quoted at the close at 16½c to —, and Middling at 17 to 17½c. On Monday, with a more general demand, the movement exhibited increased animation, and 3700 bales changed hands at prices showing increased weakness, but without a quotable decline. Tuesday the demand was renewed with still more spirit, 16 brokerage houses, participating in the business, and as factors met the movement freely, in many cases making concessions of ½ to ¾c, the sales proved to be the largest of the season, thus far amounting to 3900 bales.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 10250 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening embrace 9605 bales, against 4623 during the corresponding period last week showing an increase of 4982 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 70, 025 bales, against 152,348 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 19,996 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 12,034 bales to Great Britain, of 6750 to France, and an increase of 14,531 to other foreign ports.

Referring to the above remarks, we modify our quotations as follows:

Low 16 to —
Ordinary 16 to — Good Ordinary 16½ to 17 Low Middling 17 to 17½ Middling 17½ to 18
Strict Middling 18 to —

TOBACCO.—There is no change to notice in the Tobacco market since our previous review. There is some demand, particularly for light, leafy parcels, for manufacturing purposes, and also for low Admitted and Lugs, but owing to the very limited supply in market transactions are necessarily very circumscribed.

SUGAR.—Supplies are coming in more freely, but the market is very dull and prices are irregular and declining. The demand is only local.

MOLASSES.—The demand has continued active at full prices for the trade and for shipment, and the sales during the past three days embrace 950 barrels and 200 half barrels, about all the receipts, at 60c per gallon for Inferior, 70c for Common, 75c for Good Common to Fair, 80 to 82c for Fair, 82½ to 83c for Good 84 to 85 for Prime and 90 to 92c for Choice.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.

The next session of this Institution commences on the 19th September, 1867. As evidence of her success as an educator of young men, she points to her graduates all over the South. No location surpasses this in point of health. The town of Boynton and surrounding country has but one physician, and he is but half employed. In addition to the schools of Moral Philosophy, Ancient Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and Modern Languages, we have also a school of Commercial Science, in which are taught the branches of a business education. Young men attend any schools they wish, and get a showing for whatever they accomplish. It is our intention hereafter, to fill up our vacancies with a special session, so that young men can review any studies they wish, but more particularly to teach English grammar, Commercial Arithmetic, Book-keeping, Penmanship, and Commercial Law. Thus, our students can take the Literary and Scientific course during the session, and get a practical instruction in business during the vacations. The Special Session in vacation covers the heated term in the South when business is over, and young men already engaged in business can come here to perfect their knowledge of Commercial Science, and return to the South in time to resume business.

Expenses for ten months, including meals, use of furniture, (averaged), fuel, lights, wash, ing, matriculation and contingent fee, tuition in three schools, so as to occupy the student's whole time—$300, one-half payable at the commencement of each term.

A daily line of hacks, Sundays excepted, runs from Rossmore station (Richmond & Danville Railroad) to Boynton. Send for circulars.

DINING WITH A CARDINAL.

My last two dinners were rather meagre ones; but this evening I dined with the Maggior Domo at the Vatican. The Maggior Domo has been a fortunate man. The son of a small farmer (Roman slanders say a bandit) of Terracina, he has risen in the world; and, instead of the goatskin leggings and the sheepskin coat, is to be seen now in scarlet, purple, and point-lace. He has amassed, it is said, above a million of money. He is supreme in Rome. Princes and dukes bearing names great in history will watch his expression as he passes,—whether he smiles graciously, or whether he utterly ignores their existence. The poor old man who lifts his three fingers and drones forth "Ubi et ubi" is a mere infant in his hands; he is one of the most subtle and accomplished politicians in Europe. Like all who rise in the world, the Maggior Domo is a much-vituperated man. He is accounted the most cruel and implacable of tyrants. Scarcely a man or woman in that city but looks for the time when their or some other assassin's knife will be at his throat.

The Maggior Domo is an unfortunate man. Persistent and immovable in a long course of disastrous policy, he changes not, not even a tittle; but is still persistent and immovable, though every one of his schemes have come to naught, all his efforts have proved abortive, and he himself be now vainly buffeting the stream that must shortly carry him to that crashing destruction the sound of which is already in his ears. So it seems to vulgar eyes at least, but what if the vulgar eyes are wrong? What if the penetration and address that have raised that man from the grade of a tiller of the ground to the most influential position in the Catholic world, should also have imparted to his mental vision a superhuman keenness, enabling him to discern that the end is not yet; and that his part in the complicated game now being played is to hold on, unswerving and unflinching, himself the only seeing one amidst a world of blind? And after all, it can but be said of him, that he has continued things as he found them, in opposition to all change. The Maggior Domo is a master of self-possession. But one hour after the news had reached him of Garibaldi's success in Sicily, he passed half an hour in conversing with me on indifferent topics; and in the quiet of that gray eye, and the calm of that placid mouth, one would have divined that he—and almost he only—was in possession of intelligence fraught with fatal consequences to his life-long policy, and, with it, to the Papacy.

The Maggior Domo is a comely man, and evidently is not conscious of it. He has an ensemble that strikes at a glance,—one of those faces that instantaneously attracts and fixes the eye of the beholder,—so much so that you may be in his presence again and again without marking that his tailor is the best in Rome, or noticing the elegant figure, the choice texture of his silken raiment, or the fine, delicate, but somewhat claw-like hand. Yet analyze that face, examine its feature by feature, and, excepting in its clear pale complexion, it differs but little from half the faces you will meet in the next street of the Trastevere. The forehead is developed enough, but not remarkably so; the nose is gently aquiline; the lips firmly pressed together, but mobile and expressive; the eye, generally supposed to be black, is a deep iron-gray, almost blue; the hair, long, black, glossy, and gently waved; perhaps the most noticeable part of the physiognomy is the sensitiveness and expression contained in the sharp-lucent orbit of the eye, exceeding in this respect what may be seen in the portrait of Gevartius in our National Gallery. It is a kaleidoscopic countenance,—beautiful in the whole, but almost meaningless in the parts,—changeable too. At business, in the morning, that face is quiet, polite, and attentive to all you say; in general conversation, it is animated and earnest. In listening, it changes its expression, and harmonizes with every word you utter; and those who ought to know say that that mobile pleasing countenance flashes terribly on occasions; and on certain elevated dignitaries too, who wear similar vestments to himself, and who have not seldom been scared bodily out of the Council Chamber of the sacred conclave when they have opposed his will. The Maggior Domo would appear to be a kindly man. In his ante-room may be seen persons of every station, but mostly of the lowest, waiting for a conference; and the poorest sheepskin-clad shepherd may be seen, seated in the gold-and-crimson chair at the small table with the most kindly mannered and attentive of listeners. The Maggior Domo is a man of taste. He has a choice collection of works of art and antiquities; his diamonds would fill queens with envy. It is said that he invests all his money in diamonds, that his property may be portable when occasion comes for flight; but to judge from that composed visage, he contemplates anything rather than flight. He is a polite man. If I am taken to visit an English country gentleman, who has in his dining-room a few impudent imitations of old masters' pictures, though I am a painter, he never asks my opinion, but authoritatively informs me that "This is a Titian; those three are Raphaels; and the one at the top of the room is a Michael Angelo." The Maggior Domo always asks my opinion, and is "so glad" when it coincides with his own.

An agreeable, he is yet a wary man; he lets you choose your own conversation,—he never leads it; he exhibits the most special interest in all your affairs; and if you are of a sanguine temperament and easily impressed, you flatter yourself that he has occasionally taken you into his inmost confidence, and you leave his presence thinking what an agreeable man the Maggior Domo is, and surely how much maligned. But notwithstanding the well-stained composure of that countenance, the sweet, silvery voice, the ready confidence, and the abounding politeness of his demeanor, something tells me that I had better have any one for my enemy than he, and that, reversing Lord Palmerston's famous apothegm, it is fortunate for me I do not say "Civis Romanum sum."

This evening I dine with the Maggior Domo. I am received, at the bottom of the grand staircase, by an officer of gendarmes, who says something to the Swiss guard, and I am invited to ascend. On each landing are what look like to gigantic headsman, in flaming scarlet and yellow uniforms, and carrying huge choppers, or, more properly, battle-axes. A solitary ascent on a wide staircase, with such surroundings, is rather stimulative to the imagination. In companionship it would be nothing more than ascending the steps to a Museum; but the width and height of the flight, the guards, the architecture, and other accompaniments, make me feel something of a Strafford or a Charles the First sort of sensation. The headsman on the landing keep their eyes fixed right upon you, and seem to mark you for their own. They let you pass, certainly, but only to hand you over to those on the next landing.

You pass the superb entrance to the Papal apartments, when the line of headsman culminates in a knot of about half a dozen of them, and then ceases. Another flight, and you are at the top. Here some of the lacqueys come from the ante-room to receive and pass you on to the next apartment, where are two functionaries in plain black, who look as grave and impressive that I don't know whether I am expected to bow to them or not. I am conducted by these into another apartment, where are two ecclesiastics,—bishops—not attired, like our Right Reverends, in sombre raiment, but in radiant silk of brightest mauve. I did not catch the exact titles of these two dignitaries, but they sounded something like Violetta and Manvaise. In partibus infidelium. In a moment or two, entered the Maggior Domo himself, attired partly in black and partly in scarlet. The preliminary ten minutes before dinner are occupied in showing me, and asking my opinion on the contents of the cabinets,—rare antiquities,—Greek cameos, neilto-work, and excellent carvings by Cellini. I say, asking "my opinion," but the fact was, I went into the room a novice, and left it (in my opinion, at least) a connoisseur. Dinner is announced, and we pass into the dining apartment.

Beyond the contents of the cabinets the suit of apartments offered little for notice. Like Italian rooms generally, they were scantily furnished, and, being at the top of the building, they were not so lofty as might be desirable,—indeed, it is understood that they were selected by the Maggior Domo solely on account of the facilities they offered for constant access to the Papal apartments, situated immediately beneath. Roman slanders says, they are conveniently placed for that day when he shall "fly into the inner chambers to hide himself." Be that as it may, they more than compensate for any internal drawback by the magnificent view they afford of the surrounding country. I had expected but a dull look-out into the Vatican quadrangle, instead of which was an uninterrupted panorama of the magnificent chain of Apennines from Albano to Soracte, that stretching half across the horizon, seemed to fill the whole length of the window from top to bottom with a mass of blue mountains, villages, and vineyards, all growing in the tints of an Italian sunset. The dinner was strictly after the French fashion,—the usual soup, entrees, &c. I am not "well up" in the names of French dishes, but I remember there was an excellent light herb-soup, with a pyramid of grated Parmesan cheese in the centre,—I think they call it minestrone. Then the usual entrees, and a haunch of the delicious venison of the chevreuil, a small deer of the Campagna; birds also; and, especially worthy of notice, a dish of very minute ones, Beeva ficos (or fig-peckers), a bird about the size of a sparrow, but so esteemed in Italy that it is eaten with no small amount of reverence and ceremony.

Of that exact ceremony, perhaps my limited observation does not allow of my speaking authoritatively; but it seemed to be the correct mode of procedure first to look at the bird, as it lies on your plate, for a second or two, with an expression of calm anticipation; then wipe your finger and thumb with the napkin; with that finger and thumb take the bird by the beak as you would an olive, only with more gravity, and put it wholly and bodily into your mouth. I believe that the orthodox mode is to swallow it entire, as some do oysters, or, in any case, to bite it, but once; but I have some doubts about the capacity of the esophagus for this feat. I did not conform in this latter point; but it certainly was excellent,—another would have been acceptable, but it would not have been en regle. Italian wines are not generally good, nor indeed potable, less from any inherent defect in the place of their growth than from want of proper culture. While in France and Germany, the vineyards are as well kept as gardens, in Italy they are a mass of tangled weed and undergrowth. Nevertheless, there are some tolerable vintages there,—Velletri, when good, is equal to Roussillon; Capri is not bad; and Falerian—old Falerian—is still worthy of all that has been said and sung of it from the time of Horatio Flaccus downwards; and sea-water is still drunk with it, as it was in the days of that accomplished taster.

The Maggior Domo is a small eater,—perhaps he is reserving himself for answering despatches and general business in the evening; so, after the last course, he excuses himself and rises, leaving us to discuss the dessert and the Falerian; there was claret as well, but I kept to the vin de pays. It would appear that one of the ecclesiastics, the Bishop of Mavraise, is retained specially to superintend the "drinking department," as that ecclesiastic was most particular to see that I did justice to it; while the younger of the two, taking on himself the "smoking business," after the other was concluded, changed his purple for the lamel dress of the Dominican Order, and invited me to follow him into what has been termed the Vatican kitchen. Kitchen, however, it is not, but a cool, agreeable apartment, in which smoking might be indulged in without any apprehension of the tobacco fumes reaching the Papal residence. The wine, which I had been partaking of was brought for my especial benefit; the bishop taking Velletri, as more wholesome. The Right Reverend Father was a first-rate companion, after his fashion; the very fellow to smoke and drink iced Falerian with. It was evident that they knew how to do this sort of thing in the Vatican, from the way in which the servants anticipated every requirement.

The Bishop was, moreover, evidently a good judge of tobacco, as might be seen by the careful handling and pinching with which he examined the half-dozen cigars that he selected out of the bundle for my use,—sending away the others as worthless. Agreeable companionship, iced Falerian, and excellent Papal tobacco, are things not lightly to be estimated; but, like all excellent things, it is best to resign them before satiety; so, after coffee is brought, we proceed to the other apartments, as I have again to see the Maggior Domo, in order to take a letter of introduction he had written for me to an ecclesiastic in another part of Italy. The letter is ready written, and put up for me; it seems very thick, and in other dimensions larger and more like a parcel than a letter; but I have no curiosity as to its contents, so I thank my hospitable host and take my leave. During the whole of our conversation, frank and unreserved as it apparently was, a keen observer might have seen there was a rock ahead of each of us that we were aware of, and that we all carefully avoided. We examine and admire an object of antiquity, a patena with a Christian symbol on it; it is discussed and explained. The rock is right in front,—nearly touching, in fact; but it is skillfully avoided, and not even grazed. There is not the least constraint, but still the Maggior Domo and I have come to a tacit mutual understanding that that rock shall be steered clear of. He entered into the compact when, on my first interview, I shook his proffered hand, instead of kissing it, as a good Catholic would have done, and in all our conversations he adhered to the compact most religiously.

In the smoking-room, too, the Bishop adroitly avoids this dangerous rock, as well as all currents of conversation that might set upon it. I, too, look carefully ahead, and for some time get on pretty well, till, in an unfortunate moment, I bump right upon it, when, in descending on our northern drinks, I promise on my return from England to bring the Right Reverend Father a case of genuine Ultra-Protestant Glenlivet whiskey. The prelate, however, helped me off very dexterously, and I got away without danger.

RADICAL PROGRAMME OF TERRITORIAL ABSORPTION.

A Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Gazette says: The fact has for a year past been notorious here that the radical programme embraced for the future the incorporation of Hayti into the "Union," the absorption of Cuba by invasion of negro filibusters, and the settlement of the "Alabama claims" by the purchase of Jamaica from England. It is understood that a proposition of annexing Hayti was made to Mr. Sumner, chairman of the Senate committee on foreign affairs, last winter, by the diplomatic agent of that government, but at the instance of Republican politicians of more prudent instincts, the project was laid aside until after the result of the next presidential election.

I scarcely believe that the visit of Mr. Seward to San Domingo was intended to be in furtherance of this programme. On the contrary, I have reason to believe that the conservative secretary rather favored a postponement, at least for the present. The radical calculation is that upon a renewal of their lease of power of four more years under the very moderate and "conservative" administration of Gen. Grant that three Republican States may be carried out of Hayti, five out of Cuba and two out of Jamaica, to say nothing of other absorption, which with the ten Southern negro States, Massachusetts, Vermont, Nebraska and Colorado, will form an available working congressional majority, at least in the Senate.

These facts, although well known, have not heretofore been susceptible of that sort of proof upon which alone a careful correspondent would promulgate them. But evidence of undoubted character is daily accumulating among which is the following authentic expose of Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, in a very recent letter:

"Before the time for action shall have arrived, Cuba, the most fertile and productive spot of its size, except perhaps the Delta of the Nile, will have become so saturated and ripe with the bursting principles of freedom, and together with St. Domingo, Hayti, Jamaica, and their cognate races will be ready to leap to arms and defend their appropriate dominion, if such aid should be needed in the cause of freedom, and if they shall not then have been added to our own dominion by our enterprising foreign secretary."

PERSONAL.—The numerous friends of Bishop Kavanaugh in Kentucky and elsewhere will rejoice to learn of the safe arrival, in good health, at his home in Versailles, Ky., of himself and wife, after their long visit to California and Oregon. The Bishop's labors on the Pacific coast are spoken of in high terms by the newspapers of that distant region. We believe this completes his third tour to California. We trust the lot to visit the Pacific Conferences will, next year, fall on some of the younger Bishops, and that Bishop Kavanaugh will have the pleasure of visiting some of the older Conferences in "the States."

While we rejoice at the safe return of Bishop Kavanaugh to his home, we have occasion to mourn with him over the sorrowful intelligence which has already saddened his heart, contained in last week's issue of this paper, of the death of a nephew and niece at Chappell Hill, in Texas.—Dr. Thomas H. and Miss Julia F. son and daughter of Dr. B. T. Kavanaugh. With the bereaved father we mourn the heavy stroke that has fallen upon his family.—St. Louis Christian Adv.

DR. JOSEPH CROSS.—We are not sure that mention has been made in this paper of the death, by yellow fever, at Houston, Texas, of Rev. Joseph Cross, D.D., largely known in Kentucky. Dr. Cross had suffered with yellow fever years ago in New Orleans, and was supposed on that account to be proof against it, but he died of the disease in September last. Before his demise his blooming daughter, Mariana, passed away to the home of the blessed. The cup of sorrow, drank by the wife and mother, Mrs. Jane T. H. Cross, far away from her native land, her kindred and loved ones, is great, but in her grief she is cheered with the hope of meeting those gone before in the better land.

St. Louis Advocate.

REV. J. W. SHIPMAN.—Just before going to press we have read with feelings of deepest sorrow a letter from Hon. Gab. Felder to Bro. S. Pipkin, of this city, informing him of the death of Rev. J. W. Shipman, long a member of the Texas Conference, formerly agent of the Depository and Advocate; and at the time of his death, a member of the firm of Felder, Shipman & Lewis of this city. He died in great peace, at the residence of Judge Felder, near Chappell Hill, Washington county ten minutes before 9 o'clock on the 14th inst. A more fitting tribute to his memory will soon appear.—What a sad year this has been. Our best men are passing away. In Bro. Shipman we have lost an able minister and a useful citizen.—Texas Christian Advocate.

PEARS.—P. T. Quinn, of Newark, N. J., has a row of thirty Duchesse d'Angoulême pear trees, planted ten feet apart, from which he has sold $1,900 worth of fruit in eight years. The trees are now 17 years old.

Wisconsin has 13 daily papers, 3 tri-weeklies, 1 semi-weekly, 127 weeklies, and 3 monthlies. Of these 2 dailies and 11 weeklies are printed in the German language, and 1 weekly in Norwegian.

There are published in the State of Michigan 15 daily papers, 3 tri-weeklies, 148 weeklies, and 5 monthlies. Of these, 3 dailies and 6 weeklies are printed in the German language.

At the Annual Fair Nijni-Novgorod, Russia, the sales of Me chanical amount to from $50,000 to $100,000,000.

NOT "GETTING READY," BUT FULLY PREPARED.

Mr. Editor: I have a slight objection to the heading of your article, touching the letters from your city to a Northern paper, relative to the church suit, and its reversal, if Congress would open the way. The writer of these sentiments was undoubtedly Dr. J. P. Newman. That gentleman needs no preliminary training to bring him up to the point of taking the property of others. He had reached that state of grace, before you knew him personally. Mr. Editor, he only needs the opportunity to show the world what a profane he is in the art of stealing in the name of the Lord; and as to Bishop Ames, he takes the property of other churches, as naturally as Gen. Butler takes to spoons.

These letters are valuable, as showing what professed ministers of Christ would do in morals, and with the government and courts of the country if they could. But bad as Congress is, it will pause some time before it comes down to the platform of morals, and legislation occupied by this pure minded herald of the gospel of peace and love. The demands of Methodist preachers are not quite so potent at Washington just now, as they were when the "brother" from Illinois, occupied the White House. Congress and the Radicals have learned since Dr. N. wrote these letters, that his principles and those of his Reverend brethren, in favor of which three hundred of them took the field in Ohio, and four hundred in N. York, have cost that party 140,000 votes in these two States, and the States themselves. As Northern Methodism did more to build up, and give malignity to the party, than any other church or class, so it will do more for its destruction in the end. By the way, Dr. N. cannot be aware of the high compliment he pays Southern men and Southern principles, when he speaks of the Supreme Court, as "Southernized." The decisions of that wise and venerable body, command the respect and admiration of the statesmen and jurists of Europe, for their learning and justness. To say that such a body, and such decisions embody "Southern spirit and principles" is more than we expected from that source. To give a finer edge to this "soft impeachment," I will inform the Rev. Dr., that that incorruptible jurist and Christian, Judge McLean, was an adviser of the Southern commissioners throughout. And while from his peculiar relation to that case he did not sit on it, yet the decision of the Court had his fullest approval. The Dr. had better be cautious how he "throws stones" into a crowd, for the best men of the Northern church, scores of those filling its highest places, have expressed their satisfaction with that decision, and many of them are committed in writing. Of course, I can have no allusion to Bishop Ames. But let Dr. N. go on, I hope he will; I want the world should see him; it will do good if he will be so good as to name a single "Southern jurist" who disapproves of the decision of the Supreme Court in the "Church South." GRAPES OF ELMS.—At the winter meeting of the Illinois States Horticultural Society, the Hon. John B. Turner, a successful grape grower, during a discussion on the grape, advocated the growing of grapes on elms. He said:

When, years ago, I taught Latin to boys, we used to read of the ancients letting their grape vines clamber on elms, but I thought little of the statement, as a practical suggestion. But I find that I can't keep my vines out of the elms. If I plant near an elm the vine goes up into it. I have one vine that, despite my remonstrances, insists on going into the top of one of my elms. From it I sold during the last year $100 worth of grapes. I am therefore tolerably well satisfied with its willfulness; for these grapes did not cost me a cent for culture or care. I am now planting live stakes in my orchard; and elm stakes they are. Such stakes will save the annual cost of training and pruning, and judging from my experience, they will insure fruitfulness.

The Christians of Madagascar.

The Malagasy are an industrious, intelligent, half-civilized race; strongly affectionate in their natural relations, cheerful, hospitable, and capable of the warmest friendships. Physically, they are a fine people, robust, active, and well built; generally distinguished by well-shaped heads, promising considerable intellectual capacity, and no mean moral excellence. The eye is clear and bright; the forehead full; the back of the head almost flat, and exhibiting few of the grosser animal instincts; the nose small and firm, frequently a pure aquiline; the skin of an olive tinge, more or less dark, but not seldom as fair as that found in the south of Europe. With these general characteristics, there are also sufficiently marked diversities of tribe; all, however, being remarkable for an excellent balance between the physical and intellectual capacities, both of which are of a high order. From time immemorial, and independent of all European intercourse, they have been in possession of many of the arts and habits of civilized life. Their houses are, for the most part, large, comfortable, and not destitute of a certain neatness; and they live in large communities, well defended, with considerable regularity of municipal government. They possess extensive flocks of cattle; and cultivate, and artificially irrigate, large districts, chiefly for the growth of rice—a plant wonderfully productive in the country. Slavery is a national institution, the inhabitants of refractory provinces, criminals, and even the wives and children of criminals, being reduced to this condition. Slaves, however, appear to be treated with considerable indulgence, and are redeemable, unless the contrary be expressed in the judgment which has consigned them to bondage. Military service is a duty incumbent on all. While under arms, the subject receives no pay; but all military rank confers honor and includes the highest honors permissible to the subject. A private soldier holds the rank of First Honor; the commander-in-chief of the Sixteenth Honor, beyond which the subject cannot rise. Besides military service, the sovereign can claim the time of the subject for the execution of public works, which are at times onerous and severe; on these occasions he receives food, but no remuneration in money. Clanship, possibly taking its rise in the former distribution of the country under chiefs, is recognized; but there are no indications of caste.

The London Missionary Society, having placed Polynesia under an organized staff of its teachers, had been for a time in quest of some other suitable and unoccupied portion of the heathen world to which to extend its labors; and, indeed, had already sent a small band to Mauritius with an ultimate view to Madagascar, should events permit. A couple of these emissaries had landed on the Malagasy coast, and made highly favorable report of the intelligence and friendliness of the natives, though wanting permission to enter the interior. Radama, who had the sharpness to perceive that Christianity and progress were very closely associated, was now readily induced to open the capital to the Society, only stipulating that religious teachers should be accompanied by persons capable of giving instruction in skilled labor; and, in accordance with this condition, a staff of religious and secular teachers and intelligent mechanics proceeded to Antananarivo, the chief city and seat of government, and took up their residence there. Thus encouraged, these laborers entered on their task; and, in a short space of time, the results were of the most marked and surprising character. The soil on which they operated may be regarded as little more than virgin. The native language was a purely unwritten one, possessing no characters of its own, and, of necessity, no records. The Society's teachers applied the English alphabet to it; and, with the aid of printing-presses brought with them, they struck off a large number of copies of grammars, spelling-books, the more suitable of the old English classics, a Malagasy dictionary, and the Bible. They organized a system of schools, which soon numbered from 10,000 to 15,000 of the native youth; the more eligible of whom were drafted to a training and model school, and, in due course, became fit and successful teachers of their countrymen. A single secretary, educated at Mauritius, and writing in a foreign language, had served to transact the correspondence of Radama—4,000 civil servants, able to write, and conducting their several departments by aid of writing, were now found in the employment of the State. All private affairs of business or pleasure were arranged through the medium of letters; and few travelers proceeded from town to town without being entrusted with a number of these missives. The craftsmen experienced like success in their own sphere, and had under training a large staff of native workers in iron, wood, and other raw products of the country; many of whose public works more recent visitors to the island have pronounced of sufficient excellence to be creditable to any European country.

But the greatest triumphs were reserved for the purely religious portion of the task. Nowhere, in modern times, has Christianity made more rapid and intelligent strides, or exhibited signs of striking its roots more deeply into the soil.

The Christian places of worship were attended by ever-increasing crowds of earnest, decorous listeners; and the truths there received were carried home to the domestic circle, and made the subject of intelligent comment and exhortation. Those who had sufficiently profited by their new studies became able and successful preachers, turning to account a graceful and very effective style of oratory, which the native talents, hitherto denied all outlet by aid of a written language, exercised themselves upon with very considerable advantage. Nor was the movement confined to any particular classes, or within the immediate neighborhood of the metropolis. On a subsequent inquiry, accompanied by the most cruel and relentless persecution known to modern times, it was found that these gospel teachings had penetrated 200 and 300 miles from the centre of their operations; that there were Christian villages at considerable distances from the seat of government; and that these faithful believers could be induced to resign only with their lives the new principles on which they had taken hold.

At this period of Christian progress in Madagascar, Radama died, at the early age of thirty-six. He left no child born at the time of his death, and had nominated a nephew to the sovereign power; but Ranavaloa, his widow, and herself of royal blood, by prompt and decisive action—by filling the royal courtyard with idol-keepers and her immediate adherents, and by putting to death all likely to raise a dissenting voice, was proclaimed queen.

Though freely visiting the missionaries and their wives during her husband's lifetime, Ranavaloa was already known to be strongly attached to the native religion, and was now careful to attribute her accession to the throne to the power of the guardian idols. Masculine, inflexible, obstinate, and pitiless, she had hitherto shown little intelligence, and, in the general progress around her, had taken slight pains to keep pace with the attainments of her humblest subjects and their slaves. Her husband's death was kept a strict secret for some days, until she and her party had matured their plans. The spear—the favorite Malagasy weapon—served for the great officers of the household, but in the case of her husband's relatives, death by starvation was had recourse to. The mother, the sister, and the brother of Radama all perished under this cruel and refined evasion of the royal exemption; the brother, indeed, with peculiarly aggravating circumstances. His cries for food and water were heard for several days by one of the sentries placed over the wretched dwelling to which he had been hurried; and who afterwards became a Christian, and told the tale. On their cessation, this man looked into the room in which he was confined, hoping that death had at length put an end to his sufferings. The wretched captive pointed to his mouth, though without further power to make known his wants; soon afterwards he breathed his last.

Amid these acts of the new sovereign, the missionaries awaited with anxiety the first intimation of the change, as it was more immediately to affect themselves and their work. It came in the form of a notice to those Europeans whose allotted periods of sojourn had expired to quit the island. With such zealous care was it customary to admit all foreigners that Radama had annexed, nominally it was generally regarded, a specified duration for the visit of each; as these periods now approached their completion, it was intimated that the permission would not be renewed. In the meantime, the administration of baptism and the Lord's Supper was declared illegal. A great kabary followed, in which proclamation was made that all the Queen's subjects who had submitted to the rite of baptism, who had attended a Christian place of worship, or who had made observance of the Sabbath should, within the space of one month, accuse themselves to the sovereign; that is, make public confession of having done so, and throw themselves on the royal clemency—a favorite procedure in Malagasy course of justice, but, under Ranavaloa, generally used as a trap. On the subsequent hearing of these confessions, various fines and punishments were awarded. It is computed that no fewer than 400 nobles found their national honors diminished by half on this occasion, and, among them, some of royal blood. Others were reduced to the lowest ranks of the army—a sentence which obliged them to share the coarse and insufficient food, the scanty clothing, and midnight watches of the meanest soldier with scrupulous exactitude. On the completion of these self-accusations, a further proclamation followed, commanding all subjects in the possession of books to deliver them up to officers appointed to receive them, the detention of a single leaf being made punishable by death. These books were received with scrupulous care, stored in a building set apart for that purpose, and, eventually, transmitted to Europe. It is believed, however, that the native Christians held back large quantities. During these direct dealings between the Queen and her subjects, no personal danger appears to have threatened the missionaries. The traditional policy to ward foreigners, if unfriendly, was not inoperative, nor was Ranavaloa one to forget policy, in her anger. No doubt the chief object was to get them out of the country as quietly as possible, but their remonstrances in the cause of moderation proved wholly unavailing during their remaining stay. The Queen was inexorable—the customs of my ancestors change not; and, finding their followers thus debased from all participation in Christian worship, and books as well as all other aids to imparting all other secular instruction interdicted in the schools, they reluctantly quitted the island after a period of some fifteen years sojourn.

On the departure of the missionaries, the full storm of persecution burst forth. A form of oath was instituted, by which the accused was made to renounce the principles of Christianity, and to affirm his or her belief in the efficacy of the idols and the native religion. Refusal to take this oath was followed by death by the spear. Ranavaloa was the first native martyr. She had been an early convert, and appears to have been an earnest, devout, simple-minded woman. After her condemnation, considerable exertions were made to procure from her a public recantation. She was placed in irons so constructed as to cause great and increasing torture. The terrors of a death most painful in itself—for the victim, pierced by a number of spears which were allowed to remain in the flesh, was left to writhe in agony on the ground until dissolution from exhaustion took place—were heightened, in accordance with Malagasy usage, by all that could impress the imagination; and, most abhorrent to the native mind, the body could not be removed for burial, but must remain a prey to bird and beast. The Christian Sabbath was appointed for the day of her execution, and the oath was frequently tendered to her as she was led to the fatal spot. Having received permission to pray, the native Christian account affirms that her spirit fled in the act of devotion, before the executioners had performed their task. Ranavaloa was a young Christian convert who had attended Rasalama to the place of public execution, and been witness of her constancy and faith. His expressions of sympathy attracted the notice of the authorities, and he became the next victim, exhibiting the same pattern of quiet firmness and resignation. Having thus tasted blood, the idol-keepers urged on the work of Christian persecution; and the capital became the scene of a series of most cruel and relentless martyrdoms by the spear, stoning, the stake, and the precipice.

On the western side of the metropolis stands a precipitous elevation, hitherto used for the execution of persons accused of sorcery. This, the Tarpelien Rock of Antananarivo, rises to a height of some 200 feet from a ravine composed of jagged crags and pointed fragments of granite. The upper ledge projects some feet over clear space; and, midway, there is a second projection, though invisible from above in consequence of the overhanging nature of the summit. A pathway, emerging from the city, winds to the top of the hill, reaching its termination at the fatal brink, here bevelled to a sloping ledge for a yard or two. European travellers who have stood on its verge assert that it unfolds one of the noblest panoramas in the world—fields of waving corn, deep pastures filled with the lowing herds which form the staple wealth of the island, an amphitheatre of mountain-side rising beyond—all that could fill with keenest regret a people imbued with love of country at fixing a last gaze upon it, their beloved Imerina. Upon this pathway the doomed procession of Christian martyrs now continued to wind, its way in view of the capital, and of the many thousands of silent, awestruck spectators who lined the road. Arrived at the brink, each victim was placed on the shelving ledge, his eyes blindfolded, the test-oath offered, and, on its refusal, the rope cut which held him on the short and rapid incline. In a moment he had disappeared from view, and a crash, followed by another as the body rebounded from the second ledge to the ravine below, proclaimed that the executioner's task was completed. There were now no Europeans present to witness these scenes of Christian fortitude and trial; but several native accounts record many affecting incidents, and all preserve so remarkable an air of simplicity and sincerity as to leave no doubt of their truthfulness. In no single instance does it appear that life was purchased on the conditions offered under these circumstances of sore temptation. One old man begged that the cloth might be removed from his eyes for a few moments before death. The request was complied with, and he appeared for some time occupied in prayer. 'It is done,' was his last intimation to the executioners, and as they proceeded to blindfold him, he commenced, in clear and firm voice, one of the hymns used in native Christian worship. After he had disappeared from view, these strains of praise were heard to float up from the deep abyss, until they were drowned in death. Another, a young girl, daughter of one of the nobles, and possessed of considerable personal attractions, had so strongly aroused the compassion of the officers entrusted with the duty that continued efforts were made to save her. The oath was pressed upon her more than once during the progress of the procession from the capital; and, again, on the fatal ledge. Her father, then a follower of the native form of idolatry, but who afterwards, with his whole family, embraced Christianity, added his entreaties to the recommendations of the royal officers. She was ordered to stand aside until all her fellow-sufferers had perished before her eyes; and fourteen Christian martyrs thus took their leave of life under her gaze. The oath then tendered to her was again refused: it is even added that in this terrible moment she made effort to impress upon her relative the truth of those principles which upheld her. The chief idol-keeper now struck her on the mouth—pronounced her an idiot; and she was banished to a distant portion of the kingdom. Four nobles of higher rank were, on this occasion, reserved for the stake; two of them being husband and wife—the latter about to become a mother. It is even recorded that the pangs of maternity were added to this appalling hour of trial, the executioners thrusting the child back into the flames, 'where its body,' so runs the subsequent statement of a witness of the scene, 'was burned with its parents; its spirit to ascend with theirs to God.' The same firmness and constancy characterized the proceedings at Faravohitra, the place of burning, as at the precipice. Thus they prayed as long as they had any life. Then they died; but softly, gently. Indeed, gentle was the going forth of their life. And astonished were all the people around that beheld the burning of them here.†

Oneifixion was also had recourse to, the victims being exposed until hunger, thirst, and exhaustion put an end to their sufferings; sometimes, however, a fire was lighted, and cross and martyr consumed in one burning pile. Fiadana, a plain adjoining the capital, was chiefly used for stoning; witnesses describe this as the most brutalizing of all the exhibitions of Christian martyrdom. By Malagasy usage, the highest honors are paid to the dead; criminals alone being excepted, to whom the laws forbid burial. At midnight, however, the relatives and friends of those who had suffered death on the previous day stole forth to these scenes of public execution, and carried off for interment all that could be collected of their remains.

The greatest indignities were heaped on those appointed to die. The graceful native lamba was exchanged for torn and dirty garments. Rags were thrust into their mouths. Now, they were carried as beasts to market; and anon, they were bound to poles borne on men's shoulders. All testimony, however, both heathen as well as Christian, unanimously declares that the martyrs bore these indignities, as also the cruel and various deaths which released them from them, with a quiet fortitude and unassuming resolution. 'Let us go and see how these Christians behave—they are said not to be afraid to die, was the expression of some of the great officers of the royal household. 'We were near, was their admission of a subsequent occasion, and saw that took place. But the Christians were not afraid, and did not recede. That firmness, enthusiasm, and hesitating conviction which regions persecution so seldom fails to call into play appear to have prominently marked all these terrible scenes.

The Tangena was also brought into use. Numbers were sold into slavery, with the further promise that their slavery was to be redeemable. To others, reduced to bondage, was annexed the condition that those who bought them should bind themselves by an obligation to keep them to continued labor. Nobles, their wives and children were brought to the market-place and sold under both these aggravated forms of slavery. Heavy painful irons were attached to others, which they continued to wear through life. The property of all criminals reverts to the sovereign; but, in the case of the Christians, their houses, furniture, cattle, were allowed to become prey of the rabble, thereby bringing into existence a numerous band of spies. The judges were incessantly occupied upon examinations; the least act or word, the vaguest suspicion, exposed all, from highest to the lowest, to be dragged before them. The country was scoured in all directions by the instruments of the Queen and idol-keepers. Domestic violence were of daily, often of hourly recurrence; and slaves—usually a fanatical and trusty class of inhabitants—watched their own every movement, and, for the time, found themselves listening in a court of justice. Numbers from those all-encompassing gorges to the mountains, or hid themselves in the depths of the forests, eking out a scanty subsistence until want and exposure ended to their lives. Others constructed hiding-places in their farnas; and were there tended supplied with food by their relatives for years, reappearing long they had been accounted dead. There are few farmhouses where the present time, the traveler not hear the awful tale of breadth escapes, or be shown excavation in the living rock, dark hole, among the rocks, which was once a human habitation under these circumstances. Native Christians made their after great hardships and difficulties to the sea-coast, and were fortunate enough to attract the notice of a vessel, by which they received on board and brought to England. A measure of the general nature of these cuttings may be learned from a true account of the small village of Ilafy, to the north of the capital, their commencement, the numbered thirty-eight converts. Of these four were stoned and put to death; died in fetters, six were sent to the Tangena, of whom the remainder continued to the end of the persecution.

* This village now possesses a European clergyman, and a mission, very rich religious persecution—quite like Christians attending divine worship.

Two pictures of death, scantily furnished chamber old Scotch minister with grey and wrinkled skin. But his high and broad; his deep eyes are bright and piercing; plays round his lips; and feeble and dying, he looks happy. Let us speak to say.

"Do you think yourself dear sir?"

He fixes his eye calmly and slowly he replies.

"Really, friend, I am not whether I am or not; for I shall be with God; if I live, he will be with me."

Now let us step into your chamber. Entering a richly furnished chamber, we find a dignified figure enfolded in warm robes seated in a large easy chair, too, is feeble and dying; light in his eyes is unclouded looks like a man ill at ease himself. Let us ask a question:

"Mr. Gibbon, how does appear to you now?"

The eloquent historian of man empire; for he is; eyes a moment, then open again, and with a deep sigh.

THE TEMPLE.

In the wrath of love arising, Christ into the temple goes;
Takes the knotting scourge, and scourges, And casts out, and overthrows;
In the presence of the people, Bloods denouncing woes.

In this he, the loving Saviour?
Yes, because his love is great, Great his wrath—he sin the slayer, Great the source of hate, must hate, Scourge and overthrow and drive it Out without the gate.

Therefore, he their gains confounding, Makes the money-changers smart, Smiles the buyers, smites the sellers—As he knew them thieves at heart!
That which purifies the temple, Purifies the mart.

These into the courts of heaven Openly had brought their wares;
But, the temple desecrating, There were deeper sins than theirs—Pious cheats and proud pretences, Hypocritical prayers.

O the hypocrites! he knew them; Fair without but foul within;
They made holiness so hateful That men rather loved their sin, Entering not themselves, the kingdom Holding men to win.

These must fill their sin's full measure; Unto these must be a woe, Heavier than the scourge; within them,
As they from his presence go,
The hell-fire of hatred kindles To a deadly glow.

Dread the wrath of Him who scourges, When his love has failed to win;
Yet more dread it, O sinner, When Christ leaves thee to thy sin; When his Spirit ceases striving,
Dost this woe begin.

Better let us feel his scourging;
Than lay up his wrath in store;
Better, all our guilt discovered, Let us come his face before;
Only let us hear him saying,
"Go, and sin no more."

Letter from Western Texas.

SAN MARCOS, TEXAS, Nov. 2, '67.

MR. EDITOR: Before leaving Alabama I promised a number of friends that they should hear from me, through your excellent paper, in this far-off South-western land. I was transferred from the Montgomery, Alabama, Conference, at its last session, to the West Texas Conference. As I am on the supernumerary list, I have been preaching, when able, in the little town of San Marcos, which is under the pastoral charge of our excellent brother Gillett, who has had a most gracious outpouring of the Spirit at several places on his work. This is a most beautiful and desirable country. It is in the latitude of 29, and consequently is very mild during the greater part of the year. In the spring and fall we have an occasional norther, but to me they are no more unpleasant than the changes in Middle Alabama. The water of this portion of the State is as pure as any on the continent. My residence is within fifty yards of the head of the San Marcos, which runs from the base of the San Marcos mountain, and from its very source forms a river from 75 to 100 yards in width, in which a fish may be seen at the depth of twenty feet. The lands in the valley are picturesque, varying from one to two miles in width, and are very rich. The vast prairies back of these valleys are beautiful beyond description, and are said to be even richer than the valley lands. When fenced they are ready for the plow.

With good tillage these lands will produce from 50 to 100 bushels of corn per acre, and from one to two bales of cotton. I see but little land properly cultivated in this country. Many people plow the crop but once, and still they gather 80, and sometimes 40 bushels of corn per acre. These prairies are dotted over with vast herds of cattle, horses, and sheep, which are as fat as can be found on the grass and clover fields of Kentucky, and they only need a herdsman to keep them together. The musket grass, on which they become so fat, completely covers the ground, is from six to eight inches high, and is said to possess more nutriment than clover.

For the information of those who may wish to move to this country, I will state that, as a general thing, timber for fencing purposes is abundant and that, of the best kinds, such as cedar, and red elm, which split well and are very durable. The valleys are covered with oak and the adjoining mountains with cedar. I am aware that the impression obtains generally in Alabama that this is an extremely dry country, and consequently is only suited for stock growing, but from a careful comparison of notes for twenty-five years in central Alabama with this country, I do not think that the drought of this country has been as disastrous here as there; and what would be regarded as a failure in farming would in Alabama be considered rather as a success.

As to the health of this country, I do not believe that it can be surpassed. The malarial diseases of Alabama and States of the same latitude are almost unknown in this portion of Texas. The society will compare favorably with the best portions of Alabama, Georgia, or Carolina. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is largely represented, and educational facilities are not wanting.

Upon the whole, I think that I hazard nothing in saying that this is the best country of which I have any knowledge for the poor man. Here he may raise a healthy family in good society. The lands yield almost to a fabulous extent, and require but a small outlay of labor, say one-third of the year, to supply an abundance of breadstuffs for family consumption. He may also grow beef, mutton, and pork of the best quality with but little outlay. In addition to the above, the absence of political excitement which exists elsewhere, adds greatly to its desirableness. I would rejoice to see hundreds of my old Alabama friends in this beautiful country. By your permission, Mr. Editor, I will say something more in the future.

The Freedmen on the Plantations—Their Present Condition and Prospects.

WOODSTOCK, EAST BATON ROUGE, LA., Nov. 14th, 1867.

To the Editor of the New Orleans Times.—A plain, unvarnished, truthful and impartial statement of the condition of affairs on the plantations seems to be greatly needed at the present time. Throughout the country, and especially at the North, there exists a profound ignorance as to the present phase of the great political, social and industrial revolution which the late war has effected in the South.

I write from a position peculiarly favorable for just and fair observations and correct conclusions. This is one of the largest, best conducted and equipped plantations in the delta of the Mississippi. The proprietor has been engaged in the business for more than twenty-five years. In that time he has managed, by energy, industry and skillful management, to accumulate a very large estate—to erect extensive mills and machinery, and all the necessary buildings; to construct levees and canals; to perfect a thorough drainage, and to provide an abundance of stock and everything essential to the conduct of a large sugar plantation. The land is the richest on the continent, high and well situated, with thousands of acres of the best wood, both for lumber and fuel. But one hundred miles from the city, there is almost hourly connection therewith, and the receipt and delivery of supplies and products is as easy as from a store on Tchoupitoulas street to the steamboat landing. The last crop on this plantation—before the war amounted to 1200 hogheads of sugar, 2500 barrels of molasses, and corn and potatoes enough for the consumption of the plantation. Unlike most of our plantations, the cultivation of this was not suspended during the war. The owner was never enticed into the ruinous culture of cotton on the lowlands. He has stuck to sugar through all changes. His crop fell during the war troubles from 1200 to about 100 hogheads, and since then, by incredible exertions, he has raised the product to 300, and this year he fondly imagined it would exceed that figure, but from present indications has good reason to believe that it will not reach that number. And yet he is feeding the same number of hands; and has as many men in the field as he had when he raised and shipped the 1200 hogheads of 1860, and had not to buy an ear of corn. This year he will have to send to the city for at least half of his corn. The hands are paid the most liberal wages of any agricultural laborers in the world. There is a good supply of them. Crowds of ragged, poverty-stricken, wretched-looking negroes wander about the country begging for employment. With the same amount of seed cane and other advantages enjoyed by the proprietors of this place, and with a like number of hands under a good and reliable system of labor, a yield of 800 or a 1000 hogheads would have been a fair product and profit on the investment on a plantation like this.

Why then this great failure? Why is it that the land which used to yield easily two hogheads to the acre can now be made to produce only half a hoghead? Why is it that the cane which used to be so large, rich and juicy, has shrunk into dry, spindling, short-jointed stalks, the grinding of which frequently stops and disarranges the strongest machinery?

Alas, there is but one answer to the question. To appreciate its force and truthfulness it is only necessary to go to the quarters of the negroes and compare them with the hearty, busy industrious people, whose merry songs and laughter used to render our plantations such cheerful and happy scenes in the olden time. A most sorrowful change has come over this people. The great boon of American citizenship and republican suffrage has proved a veritable Nessian shirt to these unhappy victims of partisan selfishness and ambition. Their cabins once so neat and comfortable are now dens of filth, misery and disgusting vice. The women, no longer working in the field, either because they have become too proud, or because their labor is not remunerative, stay in their cabins, bedecked with some miserable remnant of finery, or half clad in some wretched shoddy clothing, of once bright colors, but now worn to transparent shreds. Here they spend their days and nights in idleness, filth and low debauchery. The marriage tie, which under the old system the planters found it so much to their interest to encourage and preserve, is utterly disregarded, and every cabin becomes a bawdy house. Family ties and affections appear to be nearly obliterated. There is no longer the large increase and prolificness which characterized this race under the old system. On this plantation, where there used to be a yearly increase of ten per cent, there has been born no child which has lived three months, and the young ones who were alive then have since all died off. Instead of the hospital and infirmary which constituted so useful an institution under the old system, the negroes now claim the right of doctoring themselves and their children. They buy every wretched nostrum which is hawked around by some Yankee pedlar, and give and take medicines without the slightest knowledge of their nature or effect. Their medical system partakes of the grossest superstition. They believe in charms and incantations. There is no efficacy in the medicine itself, but it depends on God or the devil, with whom they imagine there is a fearful conflict over the unfortunate patient. A negro man gave an overdose of paregoric or laudanum to his children, which produced their death. When reproached for his reckless brutality, he excused himself by saying that it was God's work, and he couldn't help it. The wife of one of the best working hands was much afflicted with rheumatism in her knee; she managed to save ten dollars from the wages of her husband to send to Baton Rouge for a famous doctor who was infallible in "taking the misery" out of afflicted bodies or limbs. The doctor, after getting his fee and going through certain ceremonies and manipulations, produced three green lizards, which he assured her he had extracted from her knee; she believed and the doctor departed. But the poor creature is still on her crutches, though she believes the doctor did her a "mighty deal of good" and as soon as she can save ten dollars more she will have more lizards taken from her knee. In medicine, as in religion and politics, they are no longer willing to look to their old masters for instruction. On the contrary, they distrust everything that is said or offered to them by their employers, except the money which they get for their labor. Their religion is the most wretched, unmeaning, besotted and demoralizing caricature of Christianity, or rather compound of a very low, ignorant and vague idea of Christianity, intermixed with some of the grossest features of barbaric idolatry. It is impossible to learn what the distinctive features of their religion are, but it is very obvious that truth, honesty, temperance, chastity or virtue, form no part of their system and are not regarded as obligations thereof. They are never taught or inculcated by their preachers, their shepherds and their shepherdesses, whose howling jargon and shoutings constitute the only religious teachings to which they will hearken. These preachers and shepherds and shepherdesses are invariably the worst negroes on the plantation—the qualities most needed in them being hypocrisy, cunning, glibness, audacity and loud voices. They have no sort of relish for white preachers, even of the Abolition persuasion. There are few white men so degraded as to be able to suit their notions of religion. All ideas of the Lord, of an immortal spirit, of virtue, charity, good will, of the rewards of a pious and honest course of life are utterly foreign to or incomprehensible by them. The grossest materialism pervades not only their religious but political ideas. And as the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the emissaries on Radicalism on political questions, address themselves to their material ideas and interests, their political harangues are listened to, when their religious teachings are utterly disregarded. The only interest they have in politics, the great tie which binds them to the Radicals, arise from the constant promises which are made to them by the rascally political preachers, of the division of the lands of the white proprietors, and an eventual allotment to each one of them of a fully equipped farm. You have no idea of the extent to which this deception has been carried. Nearly every adult negro has his certificate for 160 acres of land, for which he has paid some Radical emissary two dollars and a half. Those who are willing or able to pay five dollars, obtain a staff enveloped in a paper United States flag, which at a certain time will entitle the holder to stick it into the ground, and to claim all the land within a certain area. It is thus the poor negroes are flattered out of their wages. The preachers, the clunks, the political emissaries and club managers get the largest share. Next comes whiskey—which claims the great majority of them as its constant votaries and early victims. The prevalence of drunkenness—of constant tipping—the excessive use of the vilest compound of alcohol and nicotine—is beyond all imagination. Negroes who, under the old system were so sober and industrious, (generally those of the best class, the mechanics and head workmen), have since emancipation become incurable drunkards—have been driven from the plantations, and their places are supplied with white men. With so many drafts on their wages, the freedmen have little left to promote their comfort—to procure good comfortable clothing—to lay by for a rainy day. Their general destitution leads to a wholesale system of thieving and pilfering, which has produced two results, both very prejudicial to the welfare of this people. They no longer cultivate patches of corn and vegetables, because the industrious and thrifty are preyed upon by the lazy and thieving, and the planters find it more economical to buy corn and potatoes than to raise them, to be stolen by the negroes who keep horses and pigs to be fed out of their master's cribs.

But my letter is growing too long and yet the picture which I desired to exhibit to your readers is far from complete. In fact I have only given you the outlines of one of the saddest scenes of change, desolation and demoralization which the history of modern times presents. It is the part of wisdom and policy, as well as the duty of all good citizens and philanthropists to know, to face and to appreciate the true condition of affairs. What I have written are solemn facts, which I have no motive or object in misstating, exaggerating or coloring. I leave them to be digested by the so-called philanthropists and reformers, and champions of great moral ideas and progress, who have undertaken the gigantic work of converting four millions of ignorant, besotted Africans, just emerged from slavery, into republicans, free men, charged with all the responsibilities and duties, and armed with all the privileges and rights of suffragans, under the best system of Government ever devised by the wisdom of man. FOOTE'S IMPROVED PAPER-MAKING MACHINES.—We have seen specimens of wrapping and print paper, manufactured at Fitchburg, by an improvement on the cylinder paper machine, which are a marked improvement on the ordinary sorts in respect to strength, smoothness of surface, and facility for tearing evenly. This improvement in paper-making is the invention of Mrs. Eunice N. Foote, wife of Hon. Elisha Foote, of the Patent Office, Washington, and it takes the place of the expensive Fourdrinier machine and makes paper equally as good. By the use of this machine there is a clear saving of $157 per day in the amount of material. The pulp is laid by the new process both ways, and the spongy character of the ordinary sorts of paper is wholly superseded. Wrapping and printing papers made with this machine will soon be in the market, and afforded at two or three cents less per pound than those now used. The specimens we have examined show a decided improvement on those now manufactured; and we do not doubt that paper thus made will be the favorite in the market. —Sunday Times, Boston.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 20th, '67.

As many people have departed of late, and sought information concerning foreign countries, where they may hope to attain that object, having been appointed the agents of Messrs. Young, Toledo & Co., of Belize, for the sale of their lands in British Honduras, we beg leave to wait upon you with such information concerning its government, people, climate, soil, and resources, as can be embodied within the limits of a circular of this character.

It is situated in Central America, between 16 and 19 degrees of north latitude, and bounded on the north and west by Yucatan, on the east by the Caribbean Sea, on the south and west by Guatemala; is about 900 miles from New Orleans, 700 to Havana, and 600 to Jamaica. Its area is about 200 miles frontage on the sea, and, in width, ranging from 25 to 65 miles.

As a settlement, it has been under the protection of Great Britain since 1670. A constitution was granted to it in 1856. In 1862 it became a colony tributary to Jamaica, the Lieutenant Governor of which acted as Governor, who, with a House of Assembly, composed of three members appointed by him and eighteen elected by the people, with the judiciary, form the government. Political, civil and religious equality and freedom is guaranteed to all. Aliens may become naturalized and enjoy the same rights as native citizens.

A military force is stationed there, and supported at the expense of the Mother Government.

The climate is mild and salubrious, and may with truth be pronounced as healthy as any of the Southern States. Tornadoes, hurricanes and earthquakes do not occur. The yellow fever never prevailed there but once (in 1860), it being introduced by a vessel in distress from Brazil.

The thermometer ranges from 65 to 90 degrees Fahrenheit, though it very rarely attains either extreme. The trade winds prevailing most of the year modifies the heat, and it is not so oppressive during the summer as it is in the Southern States; the nights being cool and refreshing.

The seasons are divided into wet and dry; the former exists from June to February, during which time there is a frequency of showers and heavy, though not continuous rains, usually heaviest in September, October and November; the latter, from March until the first week in June.

The surface of the country is varied. North of Belize River, which divides the colony equally, is generally level, with good drainage, not subject to overflow; south of Belize, the surface is more diversified in character, with mountains, valleys and plains; the mountain streams rise and fall with great rapidity, and the water is pure and sweet.

There are sixteen rivers coursing through the colony, from west to east, several of which are navigable for small, light draught steamers, and all may be made so by the removal of existing slight impediments.

Most of the soil throughout the colony is of surpassing fertility; the timber, furnishing evidence of that, is varied in quality and of great value; the mahogany, rosewood, cedar, india rubber, logwood, fastick, pine, oak, cocoon nut, caboot, trees and many other varieties of tropical growth.

It produces sugar cane, which rattoons from fifteen to twenty years, without cultivation, yielding from one to three tons of sugar per acre, coffee, cacao, tobacco, indigo, heniken plant, ginger, allspice, arrowroot, two crops of rice per annum on high or low lands, without irrigation, two crops of corn, sweet potatoes, yams, yacapas, casavi, vegetables, pumpkins, melons, and a great variety of tropical fruits.

The natives produce their rice, corn, sweet potatoes and sugar cane without cultivation (as we term it), not using a plow or hoe, and yielding fair crops, almost without labor, which is a great point with new beginners in a new country.

Poultry of every kind thrives with the least care, and so do dogs; the sea and rivers abound with the finest fish, and game is reported as numerous.

Cattle, horses and mules have not been, but may be, raised successfully, and, until they are, may be obtained at moderate prices from adjacent States.

Reptiles, venomous insects, mosquitoes, house flies and fleas are certainly less abundant than in the Southern States. Merchandise, clothing, shoes, hardware and everything obtained direct from Europe, may be had at 30 to 50 per cent. less cost than in the United States. Provisions, flour, pork, lard, and such groceries as are obtained from the United States, coffee, candles and coal oil (and emigrants are advised to take them, omitting soap, starch and ten, which are cheaper there) command there the same price, in coin that they cost in the United in greenbacks. The cost of living is one-half less than in the United States.

There are no public roads through the country, but many truck paths, which will be found useful for neighborhood purposes. The labor of the country is unskilled in agriculture, and efficiency, at first, cannot be expected; it can be procured, at present, in limited quantity, at six to ten dollars per month and rations, these not exceeding five dollars per month. Women do not work in the field, but may be obtained as house servants at five to eight dollars per month; they, too, are unskilled, except as washers and ironers, at which some of them are adept.

The immigration laws of the colony not only allow, but assist, in the introduction of Coolies and other laborers, whose services may be controlled by contract for a period of five years. Labor laws, impartial and binding upon both, regulate contracts between master and servant.

The population of the colony is about 30,000; composed of about 1,000 whites, 24,000 blacks, descendants of the Africans—the African and Carib Indians—the African and Musquito Indians, and 5,000 Yucatecos and their servants, the Maya Indians.

Belize, the principal town, is situated on the Bay of Honduras, at the mouth of Belize River, which divides it, contains about 7,000 inhabitants, 1,750 European, one Methodist, one Presbyterian, two Baptist and one Catholic Churches, each of which supports a school; besides which, there are public schools; all classes attend these churches and schools. The town of Corozal, in the Northern part of the colony, contains about 2,000 inhabitants, mostly Yucatecos, has a Catholic and a Methodist Church, and schools. No business whatever is transacted on the Sabbath anywhere in the colony, and in no part of the world as there a more peaceable and law abiding community.

Immigrants locating in the colony are allowed to introduce their goods and effects and one year's supply of provisions for their own use free from duty, and they are required to furnish invoices and make affidavit that nothing is intended for sale. At present there is no taxation, government being supported by duties on importations.

Labor-saving machines, improved agricultural implements, farming utensils, wagons, carts and harness, washing machines, etc., will have to be carried from here.

None should go there who have not enough to sustain themselves or their families during the first year, and have made up their minds to work, if they have not the means to employ laborers, and not then, unless they have determined to meet with courage the privations and inconveniences incidental to the settlement of a new country. Professional men will not find employment in their professions.

Emigrants should take, when they have them on hand, some farming utensils. Collins' axes, carts or wagons and smallest size harness for animals of that country; some plain furniture, beds and bedding, flour, mess pork, candles or coal oil and fresh garden seed, hermetically sealed. It would be well for communities to select an agent, of good judgment and experience, beforehand, and send him to examine the country and select their lands before going.

It is not pretended that this country offers mines of gold, silver and precious stones, or boundless territories where the settler may find an Eldorado, free from all human cares and troubles, but to those who have made up their minds to emigrate, it presents the following advantages over any other now before the public: Its close proximity, not only to our native land, but to all of the great commercial routes of Europe, the United States and West India Islands; the stability and permanence of the English Government and laws; the peaceful, law-abiding character and friendliness of the people, who speak the English language; the surprising richness of its soil, not excelled by that of any country; the great commercial value of all of its products, in all easily accessible markets and the mildness and healthfulness of its climate.

Hon. B. W. Pearce, of Blenville parish, Louisiana; Mr. Dudley Adams, of Arkansas; Geo. Fearn, Esq., of Jackson, Mississippi; R. Fearn, Esq., of Canton, Mississippi; Dr. D. W. Foster, formerly of Opelousas; Rev. W. C. Chamberlain, of New Orleans; and others, will bear evidence to the general correctness of these statements.

A steamer carrying the mails leaves New Orleans on the fourth Saturday of every month, and letters addressed via New Orleans, with ten cent stamp, will go from any part of the United States. First class passages, $50.00; greenbacks; returning, $50.00 coin. Freight, $1.00 to 1.50 per bbl. Weight goods, $1.00 per 100 lbs.; measurement, 25c per square foot. The trip is made in five days. When sufficient passengers offer, it is intended to put steamers that will carry about 100 first class passengers, and 200 second class, at $30 for the latter, and make the trip from three to three and a half days.

The lands of Messrs. Young, Toledo & Co., comprising about one million acres, as rich as any in the colony, and as eligible situated, will be surveyed into sections, etc., and by the 1st of February next we expect to be prepared to put a considerable portion of them on sale to actual settlers. Prices will run from $1.25 to $1.50 per acre, ten per cent. of which will be required in hand, to cover the expense of surveys, and the remainder of purchase money will be extended in payments of two, three, four and five years. Should any feel disposed to pay cash down for their lands, a liberal reduction in price will be made.

We again advise all to go and examine the lands for themselves before moving, and it is particularly recommended that all should take, with them a year's support, until they can become self-sustaining in the province. No one should go who has not the courage, by his own labor, to meet privations for a year or two, or who has not the money to employ the labor of others.

Our Mr. Putnam has seen much of the country which he recommends, having been a resident there since July, 1866.

To the enterprising and industrious, this is a noble field.

The province being mostly in its wild and primitive state, agriculture must lead the way. Commerce and the mechanic arts will surely follow.

All communications addressed to either of us will meet with prompt attention.

Correspondents will please enclose postage stamps for replies to letters. For those addressed to Belize, thirty cents United States stamps, to cover colonial postage there and back.

RICE.—Some of our cultivators of the soil have this year cultivated rice, and the harvest is highly satisfactory. Rice is every year raised in St. Mary, and we believe it is one of the surest and best paying crops that grows. We hope to see considerable attention given to this crop another year. —Planters' Banner.

ORIGIN OF ORGANS.—The invention of the organ is attributed to Archimedes, about 220 years B. C., but the fact does not rest on sufficient authority. Ammonius states that organs were used in the Western churches by Pope Vibianus, in 658. It is affirmed that the organ was first known in France in the times of Louis I., in 815 when it was constructed by an Italian priest.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

RENEW.

The preacher is on his last round. See him before he leaves for Conference, and pay for the coming year. It will save much writing and much grumbling—with the mails.

CHANGED BACK.

The time of holding the Mississippi Conference, is to be December the 4th, at Natchez—and not the 11th, as stated heretofore.

So the time of holding the Louisiana Conference, will be the 11th of December, at New Orleans—and not the 18th.

We have just received a letter from the Rev. W. E. M. Linfield, which says: "A letter from the Bishop, dated the 11th inst. confirms his dispatch to me, dated the 2d inst. Both say the Mississippi Conference will meet on the 4th of December, and both that the Louisiana Conference is unchanged." The note received by us from Bishop Paine was without date, as published in our last number; this coming after his dispatch led to the conclusion that the note stated his latest conclusion. From observations we think that the practice of changing the time or place of holding a Conference is attended with more evil than good, and we hope that hereafter our Bishops will not listen to such recommendations.

Lay-Representatives.

The District Stewards of the New Orleans District, held a meeting on the 26th inst., as appointed, in Carondelet Street Church, and upon the first ballot elected from the nominees of the several Quarterly Conferences, four Lay Representatives to the next Louisiana Conference, viz: W. H. Dameron, Dr. B. H. Moss, J. O. Fuqua, Esq., and Rev. J. C. Miller.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

It will be seen by his advertisement in this week's Advocate, that W. P. HARRISON, No. 52 Union street, is the sole agent of Messrs. Young, Toledo & Co., for the sale of lands in British Honduras. Of the reliability of Mr. Harrison, we cannot say too much. We publish this week, also a statement in regard to British Honduras, which is intended to answer all the many enquiries which are made daily by persons who think of emigrating to that country. We noticed that the steamer which went out last week, carried a good list of passengers, indeed as many as she could hold.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

It is well that so great a responsibility as that of holding 'the keys' should be borne by the whole church; and that this hesitancy to go forward, and unseal the promises of life to the nations cannot be traced to any particular person, or distinct part of our Zion. If it could, we should be the last to fix it, being too seriously convinced of our own sins of omission in many directions. Indeed the glory of God advances with the whole marching host rather than with any one of its standards, and we must look to a movement of the whole of our people before indulging in any reasonable expectation of large results from the operations of our Foreign Missionary Board. That movement has as yet been very slight. We had a wide field at home among heathen tribes—a field which while it exhausted and employed a good deal of Missionary zeal, had very little of the true Missionary element in it. The Negro though a slave was the member of some Christian family, and to send the gospel to him was merely the sending it to our own houses. The proper work of the family altar was pronounced to be identical with the spirit of Missionary enterprise. We demur to any such rendering of the Great Commission; we do not confound things in themselves so distinct. The immense appropriations of the Missionary Board of the M. E. Church, for the purpose of waging a political crusade within the bounds of each of the Southern States are set down as to "American Domestic Missions." The fact that these sums are paid to "Missionaries," and that "Conferences" are held, deceives no one into the belief that they really, either in spirit or action, are in conformity with the command to spread the gospel. We, of course, do not for one moment think such partizan strife worthy to be mentioned with the work of the Southern Church, upon the sugar, rice, and cotton plantations. We know of no more self-sacrificing work than was this noble toil—that is, upon the part of the ministers; but not upon the part of the membership. As the sending the gospel to our own is a good work, but not a missionary; so sending it to illustrate 'loyalty' may be well conceived, but has a little too much of the spirit of 'this world' in it to command the admiration of the Angels.

The Holy Spirit has assigned appropriate duties to each member of 'the body,' that it may be justly developed, and that the whole may 'come unto the measure' of the stature of the fullness of Christ. But nothing conspires more to the 'unity of the faith' by which this grand result is to be secured, than those great enterprises upon which he has set the whole church, and those great achievements which surpass the powers of single Christians, as much as the conquest of a nation surpasses the power of a single arm. United prayer, united faith, the resources of a whole church sending forth, as from springs, its contributions of love from every valley, and hill side, where its people assemble to worship God, must be tributary and essential to the great undertaking. The very difficulties of the be reduced and mastered, the hostility of the barbarian, the distance by sea to be traversed, the loss of men, the large outlay, the gradual and necessarily feeble steps which must precede a firm footing, the 'many Adversaries,' and above all, the wavering faith at home, these all, do but present a field worthy of sublime command—the languages to God's host militant. Who would have had the difficulties of entering India, or China, or Madagascar, or the Sandwich Islands, any less, now that they have been overcome? Every noble spirit that fell upon those battle fields has enriched the church of God by the bare inheritance of his name; and every mother in Israel points her son to those champions of the Cross, to strengthen him for the conflict of life. Upon what else shall these mighty energies of the church be turned? where is the task that can fully employ her divine gifts? Has she not received a thousand times more than might have sufficed for the spread of God's truth over the whole world, and shall her soul and vision be narrowed to one country, and to the fortunes of a single civilization? To repress a natural, an appointed development of a good law of life is to invoke death. We dare neither shut the Bible, nor chain it.

It is a great mistake to suppose that Christianity has received its highest development when it has reached England or America, France or Germany. All of these have contributed much to the present high conception of Christian character. But as the religion of Christ found its grandest expression in the Greek and the Roman people, and not among his own countrymen, so there may yet be a glory of the spirit which awaits the embrace of the gospel by the Eastern types of humanity. It is but reasonable to suppose that those permanent races which include one-half of the whole human family, will be able to contribute fully as much to the illustration of the new manhood as the people of the West have. The imagination of those children of the Orient is yet to be baptized in the full radiance of the Spirit before we shall see all the 'glories of the Lamb.'

The Island of Madagascar already stands forth pre-eminent in the history of the Christian church. The Malagasy have equalled in heroic constancy, and Christian fortitude, the early martyrs under the Roman Emperors, or the Protestants under the persecution of Philip of Spain. We confess that we stand amazed at the grace of God as evidenced in the faith and sufferings of this people during the year 1845 to 1862. It constitutes the crowning triumph of the faith of this century. Europe has nothing to place beside it, nor has any country in Christendom. For 17 years, left entirely to themselves, these native converts of Madagascar demonstrated with power, meekness, and patience, equalling that of the immediate Disciples of the Saviour, their devotion to, and faith in the doctrines of the Gospel. They alone have repaid a thousand fold every Church for all that it may have done for the establishment of Missions among the heathen. They have demonstrated that the wonderful record of the ancient Martyrs is not fabulous, but that a human being may shout the praises of God in the midst of flame. As the "Morning Star," this Martyr Church in Madagascar will shine in the front of the English Church Triumphant—the chief glory in her "crown of rejoicing."

We refer the reader to the article in the Advocate, entitled the "Christians of Madagascar," for the fullest confirmation of the estimate we here make of a development of the power of faith in Christ, to which it may be, even American Christians were not equal. As the sun marches on, kindling new tints of light upon every landscape that it reaches, so the purer Light, the Holy Ghost, pours his ray of varied glory upon every Nation amid the first announcements of the Gospel.

THE BOTTOM OUT.

We have just returned from a District of country where, as it seems to us, the 'bottom has dropped out.' It lies in one of the lower parishes, and is under seven feet of water whenever the Mississippi rises. It has been overflowed for the past three years. Formerly one of the most wealthy and productive sugar regions of the State, its people are slow to yield to the ruin which presses steadily upon them. We saw the water marks in their parlors, and at one brother's, the 'Preacher's Room,' in which his wife had attempted to kill, and he did kill an alligator six feet long. Everything that could not climb a tree, or a platform, was drowned in the floods; the blackberry bushes were destroyed; the bear, and deer, and wild cats, all driven out—many of them died from exhaustion; no corn, no hogs, but few coons; gardens, orchards, out houses, all gone to rack; fences clean gone—only the negro remains. What there is in such a region to interest a white man, we cannot see, or how he finds dry land enough to build hope upon. Yet those people are of all the most hopeful, for they expect the Government to rebuild the levees in time for them to make the next crop! There's a simplicity worthy of a modern patriot!

This is part of a Circuit, that was once flourishing. We believed the preacher, when he calmly observed, that he had not 'a single steward worth as much to the work as a good laying hen would be.' And yet that region ought to have preaching, indeed in some respects needs it more than ever. The people are anxious for Sunday Schools, as offering their children the opportunity of learning to read, may be the only one. They need the encouraging truths of the gospel. Too poor to move, they would make the best of their straitened circumstances. So much for a region where, in addition to the labor question, the floods are working sure and rapid destruction.

But we were also upon higher ground, up the river, and not down among the bayous. There the blackberry bushes stood in thick unrestrained luxuriance, the fields were rich, the ground far above high-water mark, and negroes superabundant, yet here too 'the bottom had dropped out.' The country is worth only what its labor is worth; but that is worthless. Unwilling to work, not able to plan, ungoverned, and, as things now are, ungovernable, the negro presses down upon all the land with his lazy weight, and his immense food-consuming capacity. He has not made half enough to support himself, and the writer is at hand. In the Felicianas he has killed all the squirrels, nearly all the hogs, and is now killing the large stock. The prospect is that, if let alone, he will starve himself and everybody else. Corn-houses are broken open, and a man must put his meat under his pillow if he expects to eat it.

This year will effectually demonstrate, that the negro if let alone cannot live out of the tropics. It will take the moral out of the Negro-question completely, and reduce the whole discussion to a question in 'physics'; that is, whether the negro is capable of liberty, and life, at the same time. At present it seems evident, that it is not 'liberty or slavery' with him, but 'death or slavery.' As a slave he lives; as a freeman he dies. Now we would not have slavery back, no, not as we value the future good of this country, and of our own posterity; but we merely state that the demonstration of this negro-question is taking place, if it has not already; and that the moral element which we supposed to be in it, has been eliminated from it by the actual experiment of freeing the negro. The work has been short, sharp, — half a million of white men have died over this abolition question; its friends have triumphed; the lower valley of the Mississippi has been sacrificed to the experiment; the great agricultural exports of the country, from the cotton and cane plants, have dwindled that the negro might enjoy his newly-found leisure. Nay, more, he has been stuck up like a pet monkey on perches, jury boxes, and rostrums; but the sum of it all is that by himself he cannot live; he cannot during seed time and harvest get out of the ground enough food to keep him alive during the year; and if he is in numbers, in any large proportion to the inhabitants of any district in the temperate zone, he will starve both himself and them. In those regions of the earth where it is always seed time, and always harvest, he might possibly live; as there forecast is not absolutely necessary; but even there he would require some wild, spontaneous fruits, as in the tropics, to supply his constitutional lack of energy and thrift.

The Lord made the Negro for the Tropics, if he did not the Tropics for the negro: here he is out of his place, and the sooner he gets back to the hot suns of his native land, the sooner will he be able to enjoy the dreams, which the abolitionist dreams for him, of 'liberty and life.' To us the negro is useless. Even with the best management of intelligent and experienced minds he cannot be supported. Planting has not paid, will not — the 'bottom' has dropped out of it.

OBITUARIES.

The Northern Advocate's have under the head of "Terms of Advertising" an item, which reads: "Obituaries 10 cts. per line, 10 words to the line." The reader will please look at the number of these notices of deceased persons, that we publish this week; for all which nothing is paid. Now we submit: 1. That no one ought to write such a notice, unless he be requested by the friends of the deceased; 2. That those who wish the death of parties noticed, for their own satisfaction, should be willing to pay for it. We think that it is as little as could be done, to inclose a $5 bill in the letter with the obituary. The information given in such communications is sometimes of general interest, but often of interest only to relatives and connections. For a paper to spend one thousand dollars a year in publishing obituaries, is certainly doing more than its share in a department of service in which but comparatively few are served.

We read with much spiritual profit, many of these testimonies to the holy lives of the saints, and of their bold passage through the 'iron gates'; but not so with the larger part of our readers. If these memorials of friendship were presented by experienced writers, this department might be made the most generally attractive one in the paper; but of necessity, often these annals are prepared by unpracticed hands, and have no merit beyond the affection which breathes through their periods. This we know cannot be otherwise, and we make no complaint; but think that all should mutually share these burdens and not expect one to carry the whole.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

TUSKEGEE, ALA., Nov. 20, '67.

Mr. Editor: You see I am not off yet to a foreign country, but I have great and good news from a "far country."

The Lord has blessed us with a sweeping revival, if that word is ever allowable in such connection. At least a hundred have been converted, and seventy-three (73) added to the church, a large number of them young men, some of great promise to the church.

Yours truly, O. R. BATE.

Waynesboro, Miss., November, 19th, 1867.

MR. EDITOR:—On last Sunday night we closed a meeting here, which was protracted for two weeks, and resulted in thirty-four conversions, and twenty-three accessions to the Church. There has also recently been held a meeting at Shubuta, near here, at which there were nearly forty conversions, and thirty-five accessions. The revival spirit is quite general in this section.

GENERAL NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26, 1867.

House.—A resolution was adopted that no committee shall incur expenses hereafter without further orders of the House.

Boutwell, second member of the Judiciary Committee rose, to report testimony taken by the Committee on Impeachment and majority report.—Chairman Wilson dissenting. The report was prepared by Williams, of Pennsylvania.

The summary of the majority report is as follows: "In accordance with the testimony herewith submitted and the views of the law here presented, the committee is of the opinion that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, in that etc." It closes with the resolution, "Resolved, That Andrew Johnson be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors."

The report was followed by mingled expressions of applause and disapprobation, the speaker meantime using his gravel.

Wilson, chairman, for himself and Woodbridge, presented a report, which concludes: We therefore declare that the case before us, as presented by the testimony and such high crimes and misdemeanors within the meaning of the constitution, as requires the constitutional interposition of the House, we commend the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of the impeachment of the President of the United States; and that the vote be laid on the table.

Mr. Marshall, on behalf of Mr. and Mr. Eldridge, stated, that they fully concurred in the resolution offered by Chairman Wilson; also, concurred entirely with argument regarding the law of case and application of the evidence thereto; but there were differences on some points, which induced Mr. Eldridge to submit a report.

The reports were all laid upon the table and ordered to be printed, were made the special order of Wednesday of next week. The bill to suspend civil officers during impeachment, was referred to the Judiciary Committee. A motion was subsequently made by Blaine, of Maine, to reconsider vote of reference and to take vote to reconsider, which failed. A bill in the Judiciary Committee removes it from the arbitrary control of the House, was regarded a sort of test on this question. Blaine's motion prevailed with little opposition, indicating weakness of the scheme to suspend before conviction.

The rules were suspended and resolutions adopted declaring the judgment of the House necessary to proceed at with building and equipping ships.

The rules were suspended resolution offered declaring the present condition of affairs further purchase of territory expedient, and the House held under no obligation to vote for such purposes.

A bill declaring St. Louis a free port was referred to the committee on Commerce. Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25.—The galleries of the House were filled with spectators, anxious to report on impeachment. During session about half of the were present.

It had become so well known that the majority report would mend impeachment, that few were surprised when their surmises were confirmed, but none expected the postponement of session until the December. The impeachers claim that will strengthen their forces, the opponents of the measure that the longer the final report off the more certain will be defeat of the project. Each confidently assert their correctness, but there is scarcely a chance that the party opposed to it has already a very majority in the House.

The appointment of Gen. as Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee took nearly two by surprise, for his name had been mentioned in connection with that position.

IN MEMORIAM.

Upon motion of Rev. J. Ahrens, by the Quarterly Conference for the German of New Orleans, of the Church, South, met in Convention, Nov. 10th, 1867, in the street church, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted: That we feel deeply the loss of the Rev. LEONOLD LEMM, who his devoted wife, fell victim September last, to the then prevailing epidemic. Their amiable holy characters had soon won hearts, and we fondly look forward to a career of usefulness, which should advance the cause of Christianity and Mel among the Germans in our land. But an all wise and loving God has ordered otherwise, and we only too blessedly miss this sainted pair to guide us to heaven.

That, we hereby tender our friends and relatives our sympathy in their double bereavement.

That the Secretary of the conference be instructed to forward these resolutions to their friends in Virginia, and also copies of the Baltimore Episcopalian, and the N. O. Christian Advocate.

OBITUARIES.

Sister CATHARINE DOUGLAS, wife of Rev. A. M. L. Douglas, daughter of Henry and Matilda Smilie, was born in Montgomery county, Alabama, Aug. 3rd, 1846, and died of consumption, Nov. 18, 1867, aged 22 years, 3 months, and 15 days.

At the age of 13, she joined the Christian Church, in which she lived a consistent life, dismissed by letter in good standing, when she joined the M. E. Church, South, in Orion, Ala., in which Church she lived in the enjoyment of the love of God till called to her reward. The longer she served the Lord, the more fixed was her devotion to principle and duty; as evidence of which she held "family prayer" in the absence of her husband. As further evidence of her fixedness of principle, she bore her afflictions uncomplainingly to the hour of death. She approached death slowly, calmly, yet calmly. Among her last utterances she said "I was going home."

She leaves a devoted and kind husband, a sweet little daughter, and a large congregation, and many friends to mourn her death. But she was greeted upon the "happy shores" of the celestial empire, by her darling little daughter Sarah Emeline, who died, Sept. 28th, 1867, aged 1 year, 6 months, and 15 days—and by many other relatives and friends who had gone before.

A. DOWLING.
Pine Level, Ala., Nov. 12th, 1867.

Died at her childhood's home, in Yazoo county, Miss., September 24th, 1867. Miss JOSEPHINE E. PEASTER, aged 18 years and eight months.

Thus passed away one of nature's fairest flowers. Prepossessing in disposition, as well as appearance, she was beloved by all who knew her. She bore her protracted illness with that patience and fortitude, which would characterize a Christian of ripe years. And when, at the expiration of seven weeks suffering, she was informed by her skillful physician that she must die, she expressed no alarm, but calmly said, "I am ready," and raising her dark expressive eyes, she said, "oh, what a glorious thought, to die and go to Heaven!" She exhorted her brothers and sisters not to weep for her, and said to them, "when I leave this world I will go home to Heaven." Out down in the bloom of youth, she passed to her reward. We mourn her loss, and mingle our sympathies and prayers with her bereaved parents and relatives.

"Sister, thou wast mild and lovely, Gentle as the summer breeze, Pleasant as the air of evening, When it floats among the trees.

Peaceful be thy silent slumber, Peaceful in the grave so low; Thou no more wilt join our number, Thou no more our songs shalt know.

Dearest sister, thou hast left us, Here thy God who deeply feel,
But 'tis God that hath bereft us, He can all our sorrows heal.

Yet again we hope to meet thee, When the day of life is fled, Then in Heaven, with joy to greet thee, Where no farewell tear is shed."

Died, in Crawfordville, Miss., on the 2d of November, in the 31st year of her age, Mrs. M. A. LAWRENCE, wife of J. H. Lawrence, and daughter of J. and E. Toland.

Sister Lawrence professed religion, and joined the Methodist Church at about fifteen years of age, and lived a pious and consistent member until death.

Pierced by the shaft of that fell archer, Consumption, she lingered through many months of painful affliction, by which her Christian graces were developed, and matured for a life in Heaven, and we trust that these light afflictions which were but for a moment, have worked for her a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

For some time she was greatly averse to the thought of death, and for this reason her friends refrained from mentioning it. But as her immortal vessel came near the shore of eternity, and all hope of life vanished, death lost its terror, and sustained by Divine grace, this frail and delicate Christian, passed through the dark valley and shadow, fearing no evil.

Before her departure, she gave testimony to the saving power of the Gospel, died in hope of a happy immortality, and a glorious resurrection morning.

Will her husband and relatives meet her there, in that happy home?

THOS. P. CRYMES.
Crawfordville, Miss., Nov. 14th, 1867.

AMOS F. FORWOOD, youngest son of Samuel and Martha J. Forwood, was born on the 4th day of April, 1860, and died on the 26th day of October, 1867, aged 7 years, 6 months, and twenty-two days.

He was brought to his death by a fall from a tree. Little Amos was a sprightly boy, of amiable disposition, more than ordinary in point of intellect, an affectionate and dutiful child, the hope and prop of his disconsolate parents in their declining years. They realize in the death of this lovely youth a sore affliction. But their sorrow is not the sorrow of those who have no hope. In the dark cloud of their affliction, they see the rainbow of immortality pouring its light into the darkness of the tomb, irradiating the valley of death, and shedding its golden rays upon the shores of an eternal existence. Our faith says our son lives, that with the dew upon the flower it has been gathered by the angel of God and transplanted in Heaven, where all is love, fulness of joy and pleasures forever more; and there we shall meet him again. Dear Amos, farewell for a time.

"Soft lie the turf on thy tomb,
May its verdure like emeralds be;
There should not be a shadow of gloom,
In night that reminds us of thee."

Died, after a protracted illness at Big Cane, Parish St. Landry, on the 28th day of September, 1867. W. W. ROBINETT.

The subject of this notice, was a young man of acknowledged and universal benevolence. Kind and obliging in every situation of life, ever ready and willing to contrIBUTE for the relief of the needy and unfortunate. He was among the first to volunteer in defense of his country's call, and in that capacity acquitted himself like a true and faithful soldier, while thus engaged, the seeds of the disease which terminated his life were sown. He was however permitted to return home in time to see and enjoy (for a season) the society of his aged father and family until death relieved him of his suffering. His character and good name, stand written first in the memory of his family and friends; as also a record of his many noble qualifications and virtues, worthy of the consideration and emulation of any. He leaves the bosom of his family, and the society of his numerous friends, with many regrets and sorrows, for they surely have lost a bright star in the circle of his acquaintances, a tried and acknowledged friend. It may in truth be said of him.

"That none knew him but to love him, None named him but to praise."

RENPHENA E. BROWN, was born February 19th, 1863, and died in Sumpter county, Ala., Oct. 3d, 1867. She was the only daughter of F. A. and M. J. Brown, and being a child of remarkable promise, was perhaps too much loved by her parents, and a universal favorite, with every one who knew her. Seeing her mother's grief during her painful illness, she would throw her little arms about her neck, saying: "mother I am better"—as if to comfort the sorrowing heart of the fond parent. Sweet little Bettie! she has left a vacant chair, and a broken hearth-stone, but her young spirit has gone to God, where there is "no care" upon "snowy brows," no tears upon "rosy lips" or cheeks. And thus, are the innocents passing from us, "leaving many a lonely heart, But 'tis Jesus who has called them, Suffer and forlorn them not."

HARRIET K., late relief of W. P. Brown, was born in Edgefield, S. Carolina, Aug. 13th, 1797, was married early in life, in the State of Georgia, and moved to Alabama, near Havana, where she peacefully fell asleep, Oct. 12th, 1867.

Thus in one week, the aged grandmother followed the young child, (little Bettie), to the land of rest. Sister Brown was a Methodist for more than forty years, punctual and faithful to her church duties, proving always a friend to her ministers, and a patron and lover of her church papers. Her Bible, and religious books, were her mental food; and not only have her bereaved children lost a most devoted mother, but the church and the preachers, an appreciative friend. She was a woman of remarkable self-reliance, strong mind, correct judgment, unwavering truthfulness and candor, and anticipating the wants of a large family. She "looked well to the ways of her household, and did not cut the bread of idleness." During her last illness, she was patient and peaceful, and though suffering much, no murmur escaped her lips, but she breathed in her feebleness, prayers to Heaven, and said to one of her daughters: "Do not weep for me, my peace is made with God." May He who has thus removed this "mother in Israel," comfort the stricken hearts that will meet her no more at the dear old homestead!

HER PASTOR.
Havana, Nov., '67.

Sister MARY J. HOBGOOD, wife of Bro. Henry Hobgood, and daughter of John and Sarah Austin, was born in West Feliciana Parish, La., March 23d, 1819, was married June 18th, 1837; joined the M. E. Church, South, in 1838; and was happily converted to God in the year 1842, and departed this life in Tunica, West Feliciana, on Sabbath the 13th of October, 1867, at 5 o'clock P. M., after an illness of eight days.

Sister Hobgood, lived a consistent and exemplary Christian life, from her conversion to the day of her death. Religion with her was not a mere emotional profession; but a principle that was abiding and active in the heart, which characterized and regulated the life and breathed along her pathway a fragrance of holiness. Just two weeks before her death, she was called upon to pray in prayer meeting, and none that were there will soon forget the earnestness, the power, the spirituality of that prayer offered in behalf of the neighborhood, and especially those who had recently been converted: and these revived in the spirit of their minds. On Sabbath before her death, she with her husband, sons, and daughters, met with their neighbors in class meeting, and while she spoke of the dealings of God, with her soul, she was endowed with heavenly grace. But she will no more meet with her friends and relatives in prayer and class meetings, in this world, for she has gone to a better land, "where saints immortal reign," where toil, suffering and sacrifice, will be required of her no more forever, but where she will unite with eight of her lovely children, who are now associated with the saints of light. She was a kind and affectionate wife, an indulgent mother, and a liberal friend to the church, and her minister. She leaves her husband and three children to mourn, but they mourn not as those without hope. She was universally beloved, and leaves a large circle of friends to lament her untimely death. For they have lost in her one whose life was made up of generous self-forgetfulness in her desire to make all around her happy. To her husband, children, and mourning friends we should say:

"They who die in Christ are blessed.
Ours be, then, no thought of grieving, Sweetly with their God they rest, All their toils and troubles leaving."

C. R. GONFREY.

SARAH ALICE, daughter of Wm. P. and Ellenda Smith, was born March 2d, 1858, and died August 12th, 1867, in Talladega county, Ala.

Little Alice during her last illness, embraced religion, and enjoyed the peaceful smiles of her Saviour amidst all her sufferings. She passed in triumph, leaving her much bereaved mother and friends, the brightest evidences of a happy future.

Her mind was sprightly, her disposition sweet and gentle. Her society was a source of constant pleasure to her associates. Truly, "the King of shadows loves a shining mark," and while so young and promising little Alice is removed to her heavenly inheritance.

MELLIE S. DUBOSE, wife of John D. Dubose, and daughter of F. F. Collins, of the Parish of East Feliciana, died on the 15th of Nov. 1867, at the residence of her father. She leaves her husband and two lovely little daughters.

She suffered long and severely but endured her suffering with great meekness and patience. She was a member of the Methodist Church, and lived an exemplary Christian life. A few hours before her death, she requested her mother and sister to sing a favorite sacred song when she joined in the singing. At another time she sang part of another hymn, and with much clearness and feeling sang that part, "bind my wandering heart to thee." Her faith was bright, her hope was firm. She frequently said she was accepted of her Saviour. She glorified God in her life and in her death.

LILLIAN MAY, daughter of John N. and Eulora M. Lipscomb, died on the 31st of August, 1867, in the parish of East Feliciana, aged three years and nine months.

HARPER'S BAZAR,
Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

HARPER'S BAZAR, the publication of which has just been commenced by J. H. HARPER, is an illustrated Weekly Journal, devoted to Fashion and Household Literature.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. By arrangements which the Publishers have perfected, at Paris, with the celebrated European Fashion Journals—particularly with the well-known Bazar of Berlin—illustrations of fashions for each week of the year will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Paris and Berlin; an advantage which will long excite the very best specimens of Fashion in this country.

In a country where Three Hundred Millions of Dollars are annually expended for dry-goods, to be transformed into Articles of Dress, trustworthy and practical instructions as to the most tasteful and economical methods of fashioning these articles, become of the greatest value to American women. The BAZAR will contain full and explicit instructions, with illustrations, which will enable every Lady Reader to cut and make her own and her children's entire wardrobe with a large portion of her husband's money.

Each alternate Number will be accompanied with large Pattern Plates, containing from Forty to Fifty full-sized Patterns, applicable to every article of wardrobe made in the family, and similar illustrations and descriptions of Fancy Work will also be furnished. These Patterns will be executed in Paris and Berlin, and will surpass any thing of the kind hitherto produced in this country. Frequently an elegant colored Fashion Plate will be presented with the paper. Practical Descriptions will also be given of the Fashions especially in vogue in New York—the centre of Fashion in America.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides the leading Fashion Journal of this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novels, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Morals, Family Science, Education, Amusements, Hygiene, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, Home and Foreign Gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

In the first Number of the BAZAR will be commenced a Novel, entitled "The Cord and the Cross," or "The Brander's Story," by James Do Mille, Esq., Author of "The Dodge Club." This Novel has been read in manuscript by several of our most competent critics, who unanimously pronounce it, in point of interest and plot, variety of adventure, and graphic delineation of character, to be fully equal to any of the novels of Wilkie Collins.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and will be published weekly, at ten cents per single Number, or Four Dollars per Year.

Ladies in the country will be supplied gratuitously through the mails with the First Six Numbers of HARPER'S BAZAR upon written application to the Publishers.

Postage, Five Cents for Three Months.
Single Numbers will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of Four Dollars.

An Extra Copy will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five subscribers, at Four Dollars each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for Twenty Dollars.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

From the Christian Advocate.

NOVEMBER.

BY ALICE CARR.

The leaves are fading and falling.

The wind is rough and wild.

The birds are singing their calling.

But let me tell you, my child.

Through day by day, and close.

Both darker and colder grow.

The winter is coming, the bright red roses.

Will soon be all in the snow.

And when the winter is over.

The buds will get new leaves.

The small birds will come to the clover.

And the swallow back to the eaves.

The robin will wear on his bosom.

A vest that is bright and new.

And the loveliest wayward blossom.

Will shine with the sun and dew.

The leaves to-day are whirling.

The brooks are dry and dumb.

But let me tell you, my darling.

The Spring will be sure to come.

There must be rough, cold weather.

And winds and rain and wild.

But all good things together.

Come to us here, my child.

So, when some dear joy comes.

The beautiful summer glow.

Think how the roots of the roses.

Are kept alive in the snow.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Death of a Little Child.

BY OUR MAIL, LA, Nov. 12th, '67.

Dear Sir: The citizens of St.

Landry are just witnessing the departure of yellow fever epidemic.

after a most fearful stay among them. It was severe at Washington and its environs; but in this vicinity it has been much more terrible than even in your city. Though there was no perceptible cause, if malaria be a cause, yet it became epidemic, spreading itself over a portion of our prairie, (which is a new feature in its development), and almost every case proved fatal, some families losing from three to five members. Unfortunately, we lacked everything necessary to its successful treatment; and we had none of the noble band from the "Howard Association," to whom we might apply for assistance.

Among the many children who were struck down in our parish by the destroyer, was a child whose parents reside in Washington.

And the circumstances attending its death are so unusually singular, that the father (who is a member of our church there, in good standing) has requested me to send them to your paper for publication.

Little DORAH STOUT, was but two years and eleven months old at the time of her death. Five days before she was taken sick, and being full of life as usual, singing and playing all over the premises; she came to her father, and said, "Pa, I'm going to move in a few days."

Her father asked her where. She said she was going to the sky; that God had already told her to come, and that she was going, and that she wanted her pa and ma to go too.

When she was struck down with the fever, she called her parents, and told them that she would die, and requested them to pray for her.

Bro. Adams was sent for to baptize her, but she would not let the sacrament be performed till she had got down upon her little knees; and then said her prayers while he baptized her. She suffered twenty-seven days, but bore it like an aged servant of God. Amid her sickness, she frequently talked of her love for God, and for all men.

Just before she departed to be with Christ, she requested her mother to say the Lord's prayer; and then to sing

"Come ye sinners poor and needy."

While this was being sung, she took her mother's hand; and ere the close of the hymn, she sweetly fell asleep in Jesus.

Methinks if I were a staunch snp-porter and believer in infidelity, little Dorah's death would strike my infidel proclivities.

Very truly,

J. E. BRADLEY.

From the Children's Hour.

THE MORNING-GLORIES.

BY ELIZABETH GREENLEAF.

Henry was tired,—tired of watching the chickens, running after butterflies, and picking flowers in the meadow. So the little boy sat on the steps of his papa's house, with his chubby hand clasping some daisies, which the hot sun was fast withering.

He sat there quietly so long a time, his mama thought he must be in mischief; so she left her work and went softly toward him, and smiled at the pretty picture he made; then returned without disturbance.

Soon Henry came slowly in, and said, "Mamma, why don't that bunch of green leaves grow up beside the wall with its little sisters? and why don't it blossom?" at the same time pointing to a clump of morning-glory stens far out on the lawn, that were twining around the grasses for support.

Mamma explained to him that the seed was sometimes carried by the wind or birds, and dropped on the ground.

"But who covers it up and waters it, as you do the seeds you sow?"

Then she took Henry on her knee, and told him how the kind Father, who took care of him, remembered the flowers too; and that we ought to believe he would think of us, since he cared so much even for the plants.

After saying his evening prayer,

Henry told his mamma he should call them God's flowers, and should run to see them early, as he did the others.

Next morning, with a bright, smiling face, and with neatly-brushed hair, the little boy went out to see what birds had opened during the night. He had scarcely reached the door before he came running back to the breakfast-room, calling out, "God's flowers are blossomed!

God's flowers are blossomed! I didn't forget them; did he, mamma?"

And glistening in the dew and sunshine were the blue and white cups, adorning the weeds that had served as trellises for them; and perhaps their mission had been to teach little Henry, Malcolm, God's tender care over the work of his hands.

FARM AND GARDEN.

From the American Agriculturist.

What Shall the South do for Manure?

The great want of Southern Agriculture is manure. It is the want of systematic agriculture everywhere. Some land gains fertility, if left fallow, or from crops which may be turned under for manure, or if left in grass, which forms a sward of matted roots that readily decay when turned under. For land too poor for grass to make a good sward, and too light to bear tillage without a crop, (clay land will be improved by simple tillage,) manure is an absolute necessity. Unskilled laborers must be employed usually at coarse, common, field work; hence there is a tendency to cultivate a few, chiefly market, crops. This makes the demand for manure more imperative, and the call from the Southern States is at present absolutely painful; this is the universal need. The eagerness with which manures have been bought the past season, in the hope of making or saving a crop of corn, of cotton, or tobacco, has opened wide the door for extensive frauds, injuries to many of the victimized planters. We are gratified to learn that some of these purchasers of fraudulent manures are combining to institute suits against those who make and deal in them.

The question presents itself, then, with peculiar force, "What shall the South do?" The problem has a simple solution, but the cure is applicable at first over but a small area upon each farm. It is, to make more manure. This may be done.

The labor of the place may be profitably employed during a considerable part of the year, in taking care of, working over, and increasing, the amount of manures and composts.

Keep hogs confined. The northern farmer saves himself the expense of guano by keeping his hogs always penned and supplied with all kinds of weeds and litter, thus making tons of excellent manure every year. Five tons of manure, worth not less than $5 per ton, if Peruvian guano is worth $30, may be made from one hog in a year, provided a sufficiency of muck, straw, or litter of any kind, be supplied. A fair proportion of the manure thus made should be saved for fertilizing the ground for a large crop of pumpkins or squashes, corn sowed in drills, yams, or whatever else will grow rapidly and produce surely and freely, good feed for the hogs, whose numbers should be each year increased, until large quantities of manure are made.

Control all the poultry, at least so far as to make them roost always in convenient places where their manure may be saved and composed with dry muck, gypsum, coal ashes, or other good absorbent.

Thus a fertilizer may be obtained in Make dead animals into compost. Many an old horse is actually worth more in the compost heap than in the stable or pasture. One dollar a hundred pounds is a low estimate of the value of any living animal for manure alone. Every farmer who is buying fertilizers can well afford to pay that, and usually the carcasses may be had for their removal. The way to handle them is to cut them up, using axes and butchers' saws, into pieces of, say twenty pounds weight, and then to compost them in layers with plenty of swamp muck, crumbly peat, grass sods, or loamy soil. Do this in an out of the way place, and while it is attractive to dogs, be on the lookout with a rifle and add to the heap every dog that comes near. Otherwise drive stakes around the place, making a compost yard, inaccessible to those "vermin." It is some little trouble, but will stand the financial test, and surely pay. Within six months, or a year, the heap may be overhauled, mixed, the hard bones thrown out, and these put in to the next heap, or into any manure, or compost heap. The hardest will become soft in a year or two, so that they may be mashed with a shovel.

Make poudrette. Hints are given in previous numbers of the Agriculturist on the subject of earth closes. Offer to the foremen of gangs of hands, to those who keep the houses where the hands are boarded and lodged, and to such as have their own cabins, a moderate price per barrel or load for all the poudrette of good quality which they will make, using a definite quantity of dry earth or muck. So far as our observation extends, every particle of human soil is lost to the agriculture of the South, and we hesitate not to say that were this saved it would have ten times the value of all the high priced fertilizers which the people of the Southern States import from year to year.

ORANGE TREES.—This is a good time to transplant orange trees and evergreens generally. In trans-planting orange trees mix plenty of old manure with the soil, be careful and not destroy the fine roots with in a foot or two of the tree, spread all the roots out straight, avoid wadding them in bunches, throw fine rich earth on them, press lightly with the foot, stake the tree to keep it from being shaken by the wind, and when the hole around the tree is nearly filled up with earth, pour in water copiously, until the hole is full. When this settles away fill up around the tree with dry, rich earth, and let it remain so without pressing it down. Orange trees need a very rich soil. If the soil is poor they pine away and die.

Their immense supply of heavy foliage, kept up the year round, and heavy crops of fruit, draw largely on the soil for supplies. Old orange trees may be improved by making

The great and serious objection to Stoves Ovens has been entirely overcome in the GOOD SAMARITAN.
By the adoption of a New Principle of Heating and Ventilating the Oven, as by means of the Hot Draft formed by the Ventilation of the Oven, the temperature of the fire is so much increased, that a large supply of fuel is never necessary, as the Oven can be thoroughly heated, and all the different operations of Cooking performed with a saving of fuel of
At Least Thirty per Cent, as Compared with any other Stove.
And at the same time rendering it the most perfect and even Baking Stove now in use.
For Roasting, the Tin Kitchen or Roaster, generally known as the "Dutch Oven," is most admirably adapted to this Good Samaritan, as its height above the hearth is such that a large and capacious one can be used. That means are used for such an oven are always preferable, we believe no one will deny, and we therefore do not deem it necessary to dwell upon these advantages, which are peculiar to this Stove.
It also has a most complete arrangement for broiling on the front hearth, thus enabling the very important branch of the culinary department to be successfully carried on without interfering with the other work, and thus avoiding the serious objection made to those Stoves which possess no other convenience for broiling than on the top. One trial of this apparatus will be sufficient to commend it to the works well, and the food retains all its flavor and tenderness. Believing, as we do, that the Good Samaritan to be all, and even more than it is here described, it is confidently recommended to all.
An impartial trial is all that is necessary to satisfy the mind, and to satisfy them that it is all that respects the

Is one of the most necessary and desirable articles of household economy, and if properly managed, will promote the health, comfort, and happiness of every member of the family. Time, money, and extreme vexation by the use of your daily meals, may be saved by using the CHARTER OAK COOKING STOVE.
Over 10,000 of these celebrated cooking stoves are in daily use throughout the city of New Orleans. Every one of them has been sold under a full guarantee, and we offer them as a reference wherever found.
The Improved Charter Oak Stove has Extension Top has but one damper, and is so simple in its construction that a child can manage it. The oven is larger, bakes more uniform, and the steam heavier than any cooking stove of corresponding size ever made.
The Hot Water Reservoir Boiler furnishes a constant supply of hot water at all hours of the day, and for hours after the fire has been extinguished, without additional cost for fuel, a practical illustration of the economy in using the Charter Oak.
The Reflector Gridiron, original with the Charter Oak, and used on no other stove, is the most perfect manner to broil meats and poultry, whereby the offensive odors arising from roasting during the process of broiling are carried up the pipe, and juices of the meats preserved.
The Hot Closet, in which meats and poultry are kept warm for hours when there has been a delay at meals, besides enabling the cook to finish the greatest variety of dishes and desserts, and place them hot upon the table.
The Charter Oak Stove will do three times as much in a given time, and save 25 per cent. less fuel than any stove now made.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The general market has exhibited more animation since our last issue, but still the movement in the whole trade continues on a very limited scale. Our leading staple, on the contrary, has been in good request at lower prices, predicated partly on the tender of the New York and Liverpool accounts, and partly on liberal receipts, and the inability or impolicy of factors holding in the hope of a favorable reaction. Sugar and Molasses have come in more freely and met a ready sale, the latter at easier prices. Nothing of any moment has been done in Tobacco, the supply of which is too limited to afford any scope to buyers. The receipts of Western Produce have been quite liberal, but the market has shown only a moderate degree of animation, without any marked variation in prices, excepting in oats, in which there has been an advance.

COTTON.—We noticed in our last report that, after the largest sales this season, the market closed under the depressing influence of the accounts from Liverpool, since which the previous downward tendency has been accelerated by the course of the New York and Liverpool markets, and prices have declined $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ c per lb. On Saturday the demand continued lively, and as factors met it freely, prices, in fact, being easier than on Friday, the sales summed up 2700 bales, and would no doubt have been considerably more, had not operations been restricted by the limited extent of the supply offering. On Monday buyers again came forward with a fair degree of spirit, and before the receipt of the Liverpool telegrams several lists had changed hands at about previous rates, but after they had come to hand, together with the discouraging accounts from New York, liberal receipts, and an accumulating stock, prices gave way about $\frac{1}{4}$ c per lb, but, as concessions submitted by factors enabled buyers to go on, the business comprised 3000 bales. Tuesday the market opened completely unsettled by a further decline reported at Liverpool and a continued downward tendency at New York, but at a later hour parties came together, buyers being more liberal in their offers and factors consenting to additional concessions, and the supply being ample, the sales summed up 5600 which is much the largest reported this season, while prices exhibited unusual irregularity, showing, however, on the whole a further decline of $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

The receipts proper since Friday evening embrace 14,179 bales, against 9605 during the corresponding period last week showing an increase of 4574 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 95,129 bales, against 188,219 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 22,137 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 18,042 bales to Great Britain, of 6750 to France, and an increase of 19,686 to other foreign ports.

We reduce our quotations as follows:

SUGAR.—The supplies are light and are barely sufficient for the demand, which is good, at full prices.

MOLASSES.—Choice Molasses was in demand at full prices, but the market for the other grades has been dull and depressed.

BACON.—The market is well supplied but continues very dull and depressed. There is nothing doing at wholesale and only very small retail sales are being made.

PORK.—The market is dull and only small sales are being made at dealers, who purchase very little at a time, at \$22 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ to \$22 50 per bbl for Mess.

SALT.—Is in light supply and in good request and with a prospect of comparatively small receipts from Liverpool, holders are very firm in their rates.

COBN.—The demand has been fair but at lower prices. There were sales of 14,200 sacks at from $1 00 to $1 05 per bushel.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.

The next session of this Institution commences on the 19th September, 1867. As evidence of her success as an educator of young men, she points to her graduates all over the South. No location surpasses this in point of health. The town of Buylton and surrounding country has but one physician, and he is but half employed. In addition to the schools of Moral Philosophy, Ancient Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Modern Languages, we have also a school of Commercial Science, in which are taught the branches of a business education. Young men attend at our schools with a view, and get a showing for whatever they accomplish. It is our intention hereafter, to fill up our vacations with a special session, so that young men can review any studies they wish, but more particularly to teach English grammar, Commercial Arithmetic, Book-keeping, Penmanship, and Commercial Law. Thus, our students can take the Literary and Scientific course during the season, and get a practical instruction in business during the vacations. The Special Session in vacation covers the heated term in the South when business is over, and young men already engaged in business can come here to perfect their knowledge of Commercial Science, and return to the South in time to resume business.

Expenses for ten months, including meals, use of furniture, (averaged,) fuel, lights, washing, matriculation and contingent fee, tuition in three schools, so as to occupy the student's whole time—$300, one-half payable at the commencement of each term.

A daily line of backs, Sundays excepted, runs from Roanoke station (Richmond & Danville Railroad) to Boyton. Send for circulars.

MEMPHIS CONFERENCE.
MEMPHIS CONFERENCE,

The twenty-eighth session of the this Conference, was opened "Christian Church," Paducah, Wednesday morning, Novem-13, 1867.

Shop Paine having not arrived, Rev. Thomas Joyner was called the chair, and led the customary otional exercises—reading from Holy Scriptures, singing and ayer.

The roll was called by W. C. John-b, former Secretary, and a very number of members responded the call. Later arrivals made attendance almost as full as a gratifying fact, and unex-teded too, as the seat of the Conference was at the utmost distance the centre of its territory. To call of four names, there was response—only the silence of Francis M. Morris, John T. wether, William R. Dickey, H. H. Kennedy, had died du-the past year. Memoirs of the brethren, beloved and la-many eyes suffused with tears orrow and hope, attested the and love entertained for by their survivors. The mem-

The presence of the lay-represen-the various districts in Conference for the first time the new law—was announced, by resolution overlooking any malities in their election, they decided at once, that they lay-members received a cor-volume to their seats, and presence and counsels through-the session, proved a most val-addition to the wisdom and of the body. We may as hold here, that after the arrival shop Paine, one of his first to give the lay-members, by name, a graceful and for-roduction to the Conference.

The absence of the presiding the Conference proceeded a President, and upon the ballot the choice fell upon S. W. Moore, D. D. Presi-Andrew College. Dr. Moore the duties of the office acceptably during the brief that he filled the chair.

C. O. Johnson was elected Sec-with John Burdett and W. as assistants.

The Conference resolved, that the election of lay-representatives by the several districts, whether regular or irregular, be accepted as legal by the Conference.

A committee on the method of electing lay-representatives was appointed, viz: J. H. Evans, I. L.
Burrow, W. B. Seward, Elias Jackson, T. D. Eldridge, W. F. Mister, and B. W. Williamson.

Bishop Paine having arrived in the afternoon of Wednesday, took the chair on Thursday morning.

Communications, reports from institutions of learning, etc., were presented and referred to the proper committees.

Communications from the Tennessee and Louisville Conferences, were presented and read—in which co-operation with them by the Memphis Conference was requested, for the erection of monuments over the remains of Bishops Bascom and Soule—also a monumental church over the remains of Bishop McKendree. These communications were referred to a special committee, consisting of E. E. Hamilton, Saml.
Watson, and T. D. Eldridge, and their report, as adopted, is given in this issue.

The Rev. Dr. McFerrin presented a report in reference to his work as Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, which—also—like a communication from Rev. Dr. Se-hon, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions—were referred to the Conference Board of Domestic Missions.

The Rev. A. H. Redford, Book Agent, presented the annual exhibit of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, which was referred to the committee on Books and periodicals. The Book Agent made a brief and stirring address in behalf of the important interests committed to his charge, which we are happy to state are in an improving condition under his able and faithful management, and need only the general and continual co-operation of our people, and especially of the preachers as agents in their fields of labor, to insure success and prosperity. R. J. Morgan, of this city, followed the Book Agent in a happily conceived and most impressive address on the great and presiding duty of circulating our books and periodicals.

The number of preachers and members in the several circuits, stations and missions of the Conference, was reported to be 36,694 —an increase of 5120. These are the whites only. The number of colored was reported to be 2300—the most of this class having been transferred to the new Conference for the colored people, and will be reported through it.

The number of baptisms reported, was—adults, 3789, and infants, 977.
This report is obviously imperfect, but an improvement on last year.

Elsewhere in this number the report on Missions is published—which makes a very meagre showing as to this important interest.
We are sadly in the background, much further than we should be even in these hard times. There was not enough money to meet the drafts of last year. These, however, were cashed by the Rev.
Saml. Watson, and a special collection ordered to be made as soon as practicable, to reimburse him.

The missionary anniversary was held in the "Christian Church," on Thursday evening. Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, of the Tennessee Conference, and the Rev.
Dr. McFerrin, Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions. These were eloquent and impressive, and the collection was a good one, under the circumstances. It was reported to be about $800 in cash and subscriptions.

MISSIONS.
The Conference Board of Domestic Missions submit the following report:

We have within our Conference a number of appointments, for whose benefit drafts were drawn at our last session in Jackson, Tenn., to the amount of $3150.

We have received on the above account,

From circuits and stations..... $1,453 31
From anniversary collection..... 200 00 From anniversary subscription (assumed by the Treasurer)..... 143 00

Paid to the Secretary of the Parent Board..... 200 00
Leaving a balance of..... $1,223 56

With which to pay the $3150.
The Board has requested your Treasurer to pay the balance due on the drafts above alluded to, with the understanding that he shall have precedence in all the moneys collected by this Board for the ensuing year, until the amount advanced by him shall be paid.

In view of the above indebtedness, it was resolved that the preachers on the several circuits and stations be required to take up a special missionary collection, (either publicly or privately, as their best judgment may dictate) immediately on reaching their appointments, and forward the amount so received to Rev. P. Tuggle, the President of the Board, for the purpose of paying this indebtedness; provided, this collection shall not be understood to supercede the regular annual missionary collection.

The communication from Rev.
Dr. Sehon, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, referred to this Board, was duly considered, and its importance appreciated. But we are of the opinion that we have done, and are doing all that we can, on the subject of foreign missions. We have received from the several circuits, and stations, for foreign missions, $416 65; and $36 85 on the old debt, all of which will be transmitted to Wm. T. Smithson, Esq., Treasurer of the Foreign Board.

"THE SUNDAY SERVICE."
The following resolution was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Conference, the exact and universal conformity of the ministry of our church to the directions concerning public worship, contained in section 4, page 102, and other parts of our Discipline, will answer all the demands of Methodism as to "uniformity" and "dignity" of public worship, without the introduction of any other ritual or Sunday Service; and that we recommend to our ministers not to use the Sunday Service lately printed by our Publishing House.

The Conference adjourned in the afternoon of Wednesday, the seventh day of the session. The minutes were approved. The members joined in a hymn, and prayer, solemn and fervent, was led by Father McMahon; and thereupon Bishop Paine, whose wise counsels and Christian spirit, as well as his able and impressive preaching, we have shared for several successive sessions, announced the appointments appended, for another year, viz:

earth; when every other distinction which has marked the individuals or generations of our race shall be swept away, and all shall be alike distinguished in the annals of the universe by the new and awful character of being associated in the same nature with the Son of God.

In the effects of this gracious interposition you are interested; of its fruits you are invited to partake.
You may now reject the offer, you may now refuse the great salvation, but the period of neglect will soon be over. You may now think lightly of the Saviour, but these thoughts will soon be ended. The moment you enter eternity you will see things as they are; the greatness of Christ will present itself to your eyes, the vastness of his redemption, the importance of the mediatorial work, the infinite felicity of being saved, and the unspeakable misery of being lost; the thoughts of these will dwell with you forever. Those who now neglect the gospel will never cease to curse the infatuation of putting away from them the proffered mercy, and judging themselves unworthy of everlasting life.

What think you of Christ? The times are coming when you must think very seriously of him. Will you not now embrace his grace, and joy? Then when eternity is disclosed to your view, you will realize and rejoice in that grace of God which has made you wise unto salvation.—Robert Hall.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.
WASHINGTON, Dec. 8.—The following are extracts from the president's message:

Our first duty at the close of the civil war was to repair injuries ensured and secure the benefit of the war's lessons at the earliest moment.
This duty was promptly accepted by the executive. The restoration of the insurrectionary States in the first moments of peace was believed as easy and certain as it was indispensable. These expectations were disappointed by legislation, and now there is no single where one State is as free as another to regulate its internal affairs according to its own will. Here follows an elaborate argument on the proposition that the Union and Constitution are inseparable. As long as one is obeyed the other will be preserved, and if one is destroyed both will perish together. There is no military or other necessity, real or pretended, which can prevent obedience to the Constitution, either North or South. The hope is expressed that Congress may ultimately concur on a plan of settlement consistent with the true interests of the country and their sworn duties. This is, of course, too natural and too just to be easily abandoned. It is clear to the apprehension of the president, that the States lately in rebellion are still members of the Union. The executive, my predecessor, as well as myself, and heads of all departments, have adopted, and acted, up on the principle that the Union is not dissolved, but is indissoluble.

Congress submitted constitutional amendments to the Southern States and accepted their votes on the ratification of the same. The judges of the Supreme Court have included the Southern States in their districts. If the Southern States are component parts of the Union, the Constitution is the supreme law for them as for all other States.
They are bound to obey it, and so are we. Being sincerely convinced that these views are correct, the president recommends the repeal of the acts placing the Southern States under military masters.

The conflict between the reconstruction acts and the rights of the people under the Constitution is argued and illustrated at length.

Alluding to negro suffrage, the president says:

"The subjection of the States to negro domination would be worse than the existing military despotism.
The people will endure endless military oppression rather than degrade themselves by subjection to the negro race. The blacks are entitled to be well and humanely governed, but if it were possible to give them a government of their own, it would become a grave question whether we ought to do so or whether common humanity would not require us to save them from themselves. But it is not proposed that they shall only govern themselves, but that they shall govern the white men, and to a greater or less extent, control the destinies of the whole country."

"The negro character is contrasted with the virtue, intelligence and spirit of progress of the white race. The negro population is contrasted with emigrants, and the different terms of acquiring citizenship and franchise are stated.

The president yields to no man in attachment to the right of suffrage, but it requires of some classes a suitable time for preparation.

To transfer our political inheritance to the negroes would, in the president's opinion, be an abandonment of a duty which we owe alike to the memory of our fathers and the rights of our children.

Depicting the horrors inevitable from the proposed governments, the president says it will require a strong standing army, and probably more than $200,000,000 per annum to maintain the supremacy of negro governments after they have been established.

Without military power they are wholly incapable of holding in subjugation the white people of the South.

The effect on the public credit and trade by the persistence in the congressional scheme is discussed, showing ruin to both.

The president's financial policy has already been truthfully foreshadowed.

The message makes no special allusion to the cotton tax.

Discussing the president's duty he says after grave consideration:

"Cases might arise where, after laws had passed all constitutional forms, and been placed on the statute books, it would be the duty of the executive to refuse to carry them out, regardless of consequences; this would be involving the country in justifiable civil war."

The president elaborately discussed the financial question and invites its early consideration by Congress. "In comparing the currency circulation of seven years ago with that of the present time, he says that striking facts make it the obvious duty of the government to take such measures as will enable the holders of its notes, and those of the National Banks, to convert them without loss into specie or its equivalent. A reduction of our circulating paper medium need not necessarily follow. This would depend on the law of demand and supply, though it should be borne in mind that by making legal tender and bank notes convertible into coin or its equivalent, their present specie value would be enhanced one hundred per cent. The varied issues of our bonds and the gold and paper interests of the same, are alluded to at some length, and the president declares that equal and exact justice requires that all of the theoreticals of the government should be paid in a currency or equivalent, and not gold for one and paper for another. He favors the measure of retiring our paper currency, that gold and silver may cease to be articles of traffic, and return to our avenues of trade. It is unreasonable to expect a return to a sound currency so long as the government by continuing to issue unredeemable notes, fills the channels of circulation with depreciated paper.

The attention of Congress is invited to the necessity of a thorough revision of the revenue system and a large reduction of the number of articles taxed is urged.

Peace has been secured with the Indians, but the president has no official details from commissioners.

No arrangement has been resolved for the settlement of our claims for British depredation upon the commerce of the United States. He has felt it his duty to decline the proposition of arbitration made by her majesty's government, because it has hitherto been accompanied by reservations and limitations, incompatible with the rights, honor and interests of our country. It is not apprehended that Great Britain will persist in her refusal to satisfy these just and reasonable claims which involve the sacred principle of non-intervention—a principle heretofore not more important to the United States than to all other commercial nations.

The president says that a treaty has been concluded with the king of Denmark for the cession of the islands of St. Thomas and St. John to the United States.

The fruit crop in California the past season, (apples, peaches, pears, plums, cherries, apricots,) yielded an aggregate of over $1,000,000.

The present population of Cincinnati is estimated at 275,000; being an increase of 113,000 in seven years.

It is said that the best of paper can be made from the okra plant.

Our Sunday School has been greatly scattered by the epidemic, or rather by fears of the epidemic, for we had but a very few cases of it in town. Since the scattering, three of the little lambs of this flock have been removed to the heavenly fold. The first was Susie Poe, a sweet little child of seven summers. The second one called away was Florence Lewis, a most interesting and spiritually minded little girl, about nine years old. She delighted in all the services of the Church; scarcely ever failed to be at prayer-meeting with her father; she often talked of heaven and had longings to be there. The last that went from us was Eddie Baldwin, a dear boy, in his ninth year, and one of the most religiously disposed children in the Sabbath School; he was a

It is difficult to imagine a more policy more opposite to the prevailing one than that which Mr. Ellis now found in actual practice in the landing. Indeed, there can be no doubt that the new Radama entered on the fulfillment of his promise of 'a bloodless reign,' that dominating idea of his mind, in most large and perfect acceptance. A decent, orderly, and devout congregation awaited the English missionary at the port of Tamatave, prepared to celebrate divine service in the absence of all restriction or concealment. Numbers of exiles were met along the way to the capital, now permitted to spend the evening of their lives in security and in their earlier scenes; and the city itself was found peopled by those who had been long regarded, save by their nearest relatives, as having finally succumbed to the violence of persecution. 'It is like coming again from the dead,' was the exclamation heard on all sides. 'Some of these,' writes Mr. Ellis, 'I met feeble, wasted, bedridden sufferers. Yet to them and to their kindred their return was indeed a miracle; but a jubilee kept with them, and with touching memories

It was under these altered circumstances that Mr. Ellis now, for the second time, took up his residence at Antananarivo. He held no official appointment in the consular department, and, indeed, as he himself assures us, studiously abstained from any expression of opinion on its official policy, unless when, as in preceding instances, he received a special invitation from the King to state his views; which he did in the presence of others. Unofficially, he became the intimate friend and companion of the new King; his public position remained that of agent or representative of the London Missionary Society, in visiting the several places of public

But other agencies were also at work. The perfect religious tolerance which had marked the new reign was all the more distasteful to the idol-keepers, as they could indulge in no hope of changing that ingrained instinct of the King's nature; and, indeed, it appears to us that these guardians of the native religion received a serious, if not disastrous, blow in the death of Rana Dada. However, they were now by

Indeed, it is not until we had consulted one report, published under the sanction of the Propaganda, that we were aware how much reverence Mr. Ellis had exercised in his work. He is there described as 'the man with the long nose,' 'the designing plotter,' 'wretched traitor,' 'the author of the disgraceful revolution,' 'the evil genius which directs all this disorder,' 'the man who has exercised such atrocious conduct cannot put on paper any exercise of a sort of agnosticism over the King, and urging this movement, raising the slaves, and urging them to assassinate the French'; we are not sure but he alluded to as the arch-fiend himself in the following: 'We have a hand-to-hand fight with the devil, who would fain have us flee before his power.' Mr. Ellis did, indeed, stand between the King and the Catholicism, be it his, or his or his reproach, though he certainly appears to us to have done so with a moral dignity of his position than by the active and superfluous interference here attributed to him, and which we believe to have had existence only in the suspicions of the writers; but the latter we may decide whether barbarism is to be the alternative. We regret that Mr. Ellis did not co-operate with the Roman Catholic missionaries; but our readers will not, most assuredly the Roman Catholic missionaries themselves—must see the well-known insuperable difficulties which lay in the way. The native contenting to his Bible when a scrap of printed matter found in his possession brought death—these circulating Bibles is one of the charges brought against him; besides which, the performance of public worship in an unknown tongue, and the employment of emblems and symbols which possibly bear association with idolatry, were contrary to the whole previous history of the Malagasy Christian.

Thirty-five peers have died since the present British Parliament first assembled.

One trouble sometimes makes us forget a thousand mercies.

The following is from the pen of Mr. Inis Randolph, and we believe originally appeared in the columns of the Richmond Enquirer:

We are glad to see you, John Marshall, my boy. So fresh from the office of Rogers, to take your stand on the monument there, along with the other old codgers; with Washington, Jefferson, Henry and such, who aimed with great transgression, in their old-fashioned notions of Freedom and Right, and the hatred of wrong and oppression! You carry rather late to your pedestal, John. For after you ought to have been here! The obelisk you hold is no longer the law, and is no longer Virginia. The Marshall-law, you expounded of yore, is not at all to the purpose! And the martial law of the new Brigadier is longer than habeas corpus. So, you the volume shut with care, the days of the law over: needs all your brass to be holding it there "Justice" inscribed on the cover. Life awakes the limb of bronze, glaze in the tarnished eye, would you do with your moment of life, men of the days gone by? if you oblige us or pity us; blush or weep, men of the days gone by? a Jefferson tear up the scroll he holds, at time has proven a lie? Marshall shut the volume of law, and lay it down with a sigh? Had Mason roll by the Bill of Rights, from a rare unworthy to scan it? Henry dash down the elegant sword and clang it against the granite? Washington seated in many a wreath, in the charger that paws the air, did he see his sons in their deep disgrace, would he ride so proudly there? would he get him down from his big brass horse, and cover his face at our shame, or the land of his birth is now "District One—c"ryla was once the name!

THE COUNTY OF GILES.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number your attention was arrested in reading an article on "Giles County," Tennessee. It brought vividly to my recollection events witnessed here in years 1811-12-13. Although quite young, that is, in my early teens, I will remember the surpassingly beautiful landscape—the towering trees, the mossy plains, hill and dale, the rattle and brook—all presenting exceedingly lovely prospect. I look of your school-boy days reclining upon the mossy banks of a clear running brook, listening sweet music as the waters rolled over the bright sand and pebbles. Many such streams once flowed in Giles County. Then a soil was of the most exuberant fertility, and I do not know where could go to see finer growths of corn, potatoes, &c. Of course, these early days, rye, wheat, &c., have been added to the products of that favored region.

The county was originally peopled by a hardy and stalwart race, who could rough it and shape the perities of nature to smiling fields and blooming gardens. But they had many obstacles to counter. It was rare indeed to buy the modern luxuries of flour, sugar and coffee "fixins." Yet there was hog and hominy, rich and butter, corn Johnny-cake, and occasionally ash cake to make do.

The first trouble of the pioneers was a dread of Indians. An early warfare, though without cause, and the neighbors where my people lived, to fly for refuge to a old Baptist, possessed of a hewed-log house of heavy beams. Whilst the good old man was praying with the women and children, the men were constructing heavy puncheon doors, bullet-proof, and when completed, covered an ample defense against the wild Indians.

Then came another excitement. A pamphlet predicting, on a certain day, the destruction of the world and all things therein, was circulated from family to family. All were set agog and trembled with fear and trembling. On appointed day the people gathered together to witness the awful phenomenon. It didn't come; and like people in all ages, the fear of the world's catastrophe passed from them, and they dropped into their old ways.

the judgment day was at hand. Young as I was, I shall never forget the grand climax. The day opened warm and sombre, something like one of your heavy foggy days. Not a breath stirred the leaves of the forest. The gloom produced an indescribable sense of dread. A slow, heavy rumbling broke the stillness, sufficient to appal the most courageous heart. Instinctively it was felt that something terrible was soon to occur. And they were not long left in suspense. Such a shaking of the earth was never experienced, at least in that region. The tall forest trees swayed to and fro at an apparent angle of 45 degrees. The affrighted squirrels clung spasmodically to the branches and trunks of the trees, and the cattle ran wildly and recklessly in every direction. This was the tremble that sunk New Madrid.

These awful throes of nature were enough to startle the most stoical; and, sure enough, men, women, and children came down to their knees, praying and shouting for protection and safety. Such a revival of religion was scarcely ever witnessed anywhere. The people thereabouts were mostly Baptists, and I well remember on a bright and balmy Sabbath, when the good old Baptist of the block-house, spent nearly the entire day in preaching and baptizing.

Thus, with this early beginning of trials, which the people, many of them, conceived to be divine admonitions, in connection with the fatness of the soil, fine climate, beautiful landscapes, cool and sparkling streams, how can you be surprised at the number of preachers furnished for the good cause? Have you ever pondered the question, why it is that the South and Southwest have produced so noble a race of people? Take Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and the Gulf States; where upon earth can you find a nobler or more chivalrous race? The late war furnishes ample illustration of this fact. You and I know that with these qualities follow necessarily, or rather, naturally, a high degree of virtue, morality, and religion.

In these States have existed, since the foundation of our government, a marked individuality and independence of character.

We have had our Calhoun, Clay, Jackson, Hayne, McDuffie, and hundreds of other noble Southern, who will live in history while the world lasts. Was it not the soil, climate, and our "peculiar institution" that brought forth these great men?

On the other hand, look at the North. Since the old Revolutionary times, point out a prominent man, excepting perhaps Webster, who will go down to posterity with these worthies. Going further South, run over the long list of able men Spanish America has produced since breaking the yoke of the mother country.

Will you accept all this as a fair contrast? Then, why cannot you see how it is that Giles County has furnished the army of preachers you speak of? Think for a moment, the large number of good men, eloquent and true, sent forth by our section within the past half century, to carry glad tidings to a sinful world. Then again, look at the noble forms, male and female, produced by Kentucky, Tennessee, &c., and contrast them with the Northern people. Will not this convince you that the broad barrens, undulating prairies, hills and valleys, of our once favored section, must produce, as in vegetation, the most perfect type of the Caucasian, as well in intellect as in morals and religion?

The Common Prisons of the Pope.

I had long entertained a wish to visit the Roman prisons, those more especially set apart for political offenders. The request had, however, always been refused, with the assurance that there existed within the entire Roman territory no such places. This being the usual reply from Roman officials to inconvenient applications, I paid but little attention to it, as I had it on what I considered an exceptional authority that political prisoners were known to be confined somewhere—it was believed either at Citta Castellana, or at Palo; but all access to them was denied, more especially so since the publication of Mr. Gladstone's work on the prisons of Naples.

I have now reason to believe that the locality I visited in the marshes was none other than the place of detention for political offenders; if so, the fact would reconcile the apparently conflicting statements that, on the one hand, there were no political prisons; and, on the other, that places of the kind, to which access was forbidden, were known to exist.

The "Carcere" at Civita Vecchia, being set apart for criminal felons and arsenal convicts only, my application to inspect the interior was readily granted. Shortly before midday, the keeper took me into the ward appropriated to the worst criminals. This apartment consisted of one long corridor, which, in respect of light, cleanliness, and ventilation, certainly left little to be desired—a state of things that, in a temperate climate, is not to be lightly appreciated. Ranged along the entire length of the wall, at distances about four feet apart, were a series of sloping planks, intended for sleeping on; and chained to them by the ankle and wrist, but in such a manner as to allow an erect posture, were one hundred and eighty prisoners. I well remember, some years ago, having occasion to sketch the figure of a tiger, and going for that purpose to a showman's menagerie, at the time situated where Albert Gate now stands, at Knightsbridge. On the woman in charge taking me into the room, or den in which the beasts were kept, they instantly darted up from the keen expectant posture which they had previously assumed, and greeted me with a piercing chorus of yells and shrieks that was only put a stop to by the proprietress twice striking the door sharply with a thick cane. Singularly similar was the scene I witnessed on entering this prison ward. The first glimpse of a stranger produced a chorus of piercing, almost shrieking noises, precisely similar to that from the beasts in the menagerie.

In the case of the animals, I presume the outcry was intended as a defiance, with the prisoners it was merely the act of begging, each one endeavoring to drown his neighbor's voice by the vehemence of his "datemi, Signore," "Sono fame," "datemi, Signore." The resemblance to the scene in the menagerie was carried still further by the keeper striking his cane loudly on the wall to enforce silence, when the vociferations at once ceased,—each hand, however, being still kept out rigidly and mechanically, though I was at a distance of perhaps fifty yards; and on passing, each face assumed that half-smiling, half-plaintive look, which I have only observed in perfection in Italian beggars. It is a matter of no small difficulty to pass a number of men, unquestionably undergoing great privations, without making an effort to relieve them; but to give to so many was out of the question, while to give to a few would have been cruelty to the rest. So we passed on to the next ward.—Here the prisoners, either in consequence of their offences, having been less grave, or that they had completed a larger portion of their sentences, were chained by the leg only, and, having the free use of their hands, were allowed to earn what trifling sums they were able by knitting stockings. These also begged, but not so vociferously as the others.

The third ward being used as the infirmary, contained something nearer approaching to bedding than the first two, and each of its occupants might be seen coiled up on his pallet, covered with a rug. The general ailment seemed to be the malaria of the marshes; sometimes taking the form of ague, and at others that of jail or typhus fever. The begging, though much less loud, was almost as general as in the first ward, less loud, certainly, for many there were that were already past speech, and some that were delirious. One poor, stricken wretch held out his hand as I passed, though quite speechless and unable to raise his head, or to turn his glazed eye upon me.

It was difficult to ascertain the exact degree of crime for which these men were incarcerated. If you question them, they will all boast of themselves as murderers of the blackest dye, exaggerating the number and the heinousness of their offenses to almost impossible proportions. Something of this depravation of the instinct to excel may be observed amongst all criminals, especially when they are kept herded together. Some countenance, however, was given to the truth of their boastings by one man—who was allowed a certain degree of liberty, and who was engaged in washing clothes in the yard—informed me, on my asking the occasion of his punishment, that it was for— and, instead of finishing his sentence, giving an expressive slash across his throat with what was intended to represent a knife. He had murdered his wife, and had been sentenced for eight years, seven of which had expired, and in one more he would be a free man.

The keeper, who had left me while I was speaking, returned in a few minutes, accompanied by two others, one bearing a bag of beans, and another a basket filled with portions of the coarsest bread, intended for the midday meal of the prisoners of the first two wards, the sick being allowed a special dietary. The coarse bread I have mentioned was given only to such as had earned it by their knitting; to the others were allotted the beans only. On returning to the ward in which the worst criminals were confined, the first thing that presented itself was two of the chained wretches struggling on the ground, rolling over, biting and tearing each other's hair in mortal fury,—the others looking on as unconcerned as if it were a circumstance of daily occurrence. The keeper, too, regarded it apparently in the same light, and beyond a growling imprecation, took no further notice. Afterwards, he told me that in the moments immediately preceding feeding-time, such contests are of frequent occurrence, but that directly after they have eaten their beans and drank their water, the men coil themselves quietly on their pallets, and sleep away the remainder of the day. One thing that contrasted singularly with the other adjuncts of the rooms was the decorated altar at the end of each (thus, in fact, converting the ward into a church), and at which I was told a priest officiated once a fortnight, and dispensed therefrom the sacraments to his manacled congregation.

Being informed that a bag of the dried black figs of the country would be the thing most appreciated by the prisoners, and the easiest of distribution, I sent for one, and, amidst a most fearful clamor of gratitude, took my departure for Rome.

LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE.

Bishop Marvin brings news of a delightful session of the Little Rock Conference at Des Arc. We are indebted to him for a copy of the appointments, which are appended. Brother Browning writes briefly on the 16th inst: "Attendance large—Bishop Marvin gives universal satisfaction—the missionary meeting to-night was a success, some $800 or $900—more soon. Brother Caldwell writes on the 18th inst: "The business is being disposed of in a proper style—Bishop Marvin has greatly endeared himself to us, both in the chair and pulpit—his sermon last night on 'Future Punishment' was fearful. Brothers Hunter and Pirtle arrived to-day, and were I believe, cordially welcomed." Dr. Winfield—to whom we are much indebted for attending promptly to the business of this office—writes on the 19th instant: "We have had a glorious session. Bishop Marvin carries all our hearts with him. You will have to wait a few days for the minutes. I will write more soon." Thanks for these items, and for kind words not here given. We hope to receive fuller accounts by next week. Below we give the appointments made by the Bishop on the 19th instant:

Next Conference to be held at Warren.

From the Texas Christian Advocate.

North-west Texas Conference.

MARSHALL, TEXAS, Nov. 8th, 1867.

MR. EDITOR:—Our Conference met on the 23d of October in Rusk, Cherokee county, Texas. Bishop McTyeire, from indisposition, did not reach the seat of the Conference until Wednesday evening. The Conference organized by the election of Rev. N. W. Burks as President, and proceeded with the usual business. Thursday Bishop McTyeire, though in feeble health, met with the Conference, and conducted the business through one of the most pleasant sessions I ever attended.

The Conference did much business, and the lay element worked in all the departments with ease and without friction. The lay delegates were men of mature minds and large and liberal views, and we are satisfied, from all the indications during the session, they will be active co-workers with the ministry in devising liberal things for the promotion of the Church of God. The Bishop did good service for the church in his visit to our Conference, both by his counsel in the chair and ministrations in the pulpit. The appointments were announced on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, and on Tuesday morning the preachers departed to their respective fields of labor, perhaps never all to meet again on earth. Two of our number have fallen, the past year. Who will be next?

I have mailed the matter ordered for publication with a copy of the appointments. Yours in Christ, J. B. TULLIS.

CHURCH CONGRESS. Quite in contrast with the timidity of the Pan Anglican Council was the outspoken frankness of the Church Congress, held immediately after at Wylverhampton. Perhaps the presence of laymen in the latter body made the difference. But that as it may, the laymen talked freely, and much of their talk was exceedingly pungent. Lord Lyttleton said that "to call upon the Church to open her door to Nonconformists, was like calling upon a man to open the door of his room, when he himself was bound hand and foot in the middle of the room." Lord Sandon declared that the laity of the Church were impressed with the fact of the growth of priestly feeling among the clergy. To this he traced the multiplication of rites and ceremonies, and argued that it would end in withholding the Bible from the people, and in creating "an artificial barrier between man and his God." He warned the Congress that unless it was made clear to the laity by the clergy the priestly rule was not aimed at, the Church would soon cease to be established, and ceasing to be established, would soon be destroyed. The transition from the tame propriety of the Pan-Anglican Council to the candid truth-telling of the Congress is rather startling. It was unexpected, after the pomp and ceremonial of the Episcopal Synod, that we should have given us such a revelation of the Church's inner life, but it is instructive withal.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

RENEW.

The preacher is on his last round. See him before he leaves for Conference, and pay for the coming year. It will save much writing and much grumbling—with the mails.

By reference to our 5th and 8th pages, our readers will see a number of new advertisements. We commend them to their special notice. These advertisements will visit every place that the Methodist Itinerant visits in his monthly round—that is, all the towns, cross-roads, villages, county seats, chapels, and outdoor meetings within the bounds of four Conferences. No man reads more closely, and talks more freely than a Methodist Preacher. He gets the Advocate nearly by heart, and wherever he finds him on the circuit, he pulls out the paper, and, likely as not, reads it aloud to the family—advertisements and all.

Many of our subscribers, unfortunately for us, believe everything they see in the Advocate: this is going too far: we do not vouch for everything that finds its way into the paper. We have not tested a tenth part of all the remedies, nor even a fourth part of the various establishments that appear in our advertising columns. But we try to keep out of the paper, all swindlers, and have refused many of those public spirited gentlemen a showing, who propose to live upon their wits, by various 'gift lotteries,' and other infallible cures, at the expense of others.

It will be seen by his advertisement in this week's Advocate, that J. P. HARRISON, No. 52 Union street, is the sole agent of Messrs. Young, Toledo & Co., for the sale of lands in British Honduras. Of the reliability of Mr. Harrison, we cannot say too much. We publish this week, also a statement in regard to British Honduras, which is intended to answer all the many enquiries which are made daily by persons who think of emigrating to that country. We noticed that the steamer which went out last week, carried a good list of passengers, indeed as many as she could hold.

Hammon, N. J., sent 9,888 bushels of strawberries to market during the nineteen days ending 31st June last.

James Perkins, of New Market, N. J., pronounces the Tilden tomato a worthless variety.

The earnings of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable during the past year have been over $1,000,000.

THE CONVENTION.

Trouble takes many forms during the course of a life; but it now appears in all forms at once. Disease, fanaticism, famine, rapacity, like birds of prey upon dead branches, sit around waiting for the last gasp of the South. The full result of the theory of the equality of all men, will be ascertained very nearly during the course of the next sixty days. Seven years of Radical rule, including four years of war and three of plunder, will have consummated the designs of those political fanatics, sufficiently to disclose the gulf of horrors upon which they have been steadily driving the country. The great States of the North are waking up, have awakened, to their share in the universal disaster, but at a moment too late to avert it. They are tremendously awake now, but that does not restore the power of which they have been shorn. The cry 'The Philistines be upon thee, Sampson' will no longer avail; that great strength which was beneficently granted to Wisdom, Providence takes away when wisdom turns to folly. A whole year of unchecked rule and ruin yet remains to the party now in power—a year in which the whole land will drain the fearful chalice of political retribution.

In the Mechanics Institute of this city, there is now convened a body consisting of about 90 men, two-thirds of whom, or it may be three-fourths, are negroes. These men are there by the protection of the United States army. They were collected under the cover, and pretence of an election, by bayonets. They are going through the motions of a deliberative assembly, but in fact are simply recording the orders transmitted them from Radical leaders at Washington. This is called a State Convention for framing a Constitution. It is in fact an exponent of the demoniacal revenge, the low instincts, and the unscrupulous methods of a Reformer of the Sumner and Schenck type, whose rage has been raised to an undue pitch by well sustained and continued opposition.

The President, Judge Tallaferró, is a nervous, narrow, self-adequate-looking old man, with a thin growth of sandy hair barely covering a small head that phrenologically eliminates in the hinder part of the brain. The Secretary sitting directly before him, is white-haired, thin, Plymouth, small-eyed, long faced, traveling-agency sort of a man, about thirty years of age. One to the left, is a dark mulatto—the assistant Secretary. The visitor is much impressed with the number of negroes, and the mere sprinkling of pure white blood that compose the body. About one-fifth of the blacks are sooty, one-half are two-thirds black, and the rest are two-thirds white. They sit, a white man and two or three blacks together, nor does there seem to be with them any distinction between windward and leeward. We saw several negroes there whom we had known and seen in our colored congregations for many years; looking full as wise as any. They served as a gauge for the rest of the Convention; men who 'if they were to be hung for it' could not sit intelligently upon a church committee.

The white men were poor specimens of their race, but evidently each was the climax and flower of some Loyal League, cadaverous and ravenous, and with an expression that reminded one of the Yankee fashion of renewing old pants by cutting and turning the hind part before. One of these men, a member from Bayou Black, is now under two indictments for petty theft—for stealing from a negro. The three Registrars were all black men, and but one white man voted.

Immediately next to the railing which incloses the members of the Convention, there are seated negroes, three rows deep, with plenty of leisure to look on, day by day, at the wondrous spectacle of their own color 'making a government.' And we are not surprised, at the spellbound gaze with which an old negro drank in this scene—a sight for the century and the civilized world—liberated slaves engaged in the most magnificent effort presented to the Statesman; that of laying the foundation of legislation, and arranging those checks and balances which are essential both to the security of the rights of the citizen and the power and permanence of the State. There can be no higher expression of the madness of the hour. It is the concentrated form of universal ruin in every department of industry which has already set in. As we entered, an entirely black man was on his feet, speaking in a high tone: 'some men here are trying to steer the people of my race—Congress has given us the right to represent a people who never were represented before—let us have all we can get from them—we are an oppressed race.' He moved that the compensation be '$10 a day.' Another was in favor of '$8 a day.' A gentleman said he 'can get lodging for one dollar and thirty three cents per day, a breakfast at a restaurant, with a half bottle of claret, for one dollar and fifty cents; dinner, with a half bottle of claret, for two dollars and a half; then say two dollars more for drinks and cigars, and all that does not amount to eight dollars.' The question was taken, and ten dollars in greenbacks was determined as the per diem, by a vote of 66 to 23.

It costs the country $99 million of dollars a day to support and protect this, and other Conventions now in session—of which this is an exact counterpart. Their mere existence paralyses all the immense interests of commerce, of credit, of agriculture, and of manufactures. Foreign capital flies from it in alarm. We already hear a cry for bread like the howl of hungry wolves, before the winter's night has fairly set in, coming up from thousands of negroes who are vainly searching for food in the track of the army-worm and the Bureau. Among the evils which have overtaken us, we reckon the cholera, the yellow fever, the overflow, the army-worm, the Bureau, the cotton tax, the Military Bill, negro Juries, and this Negrarchy Convention.

Upon this deepening gloom, we have some edges of brightness. The commanding General, Hancock, has issued an order which pronounces distinctly that civil law is the only proper law of the land. But our true resource is that merciful Being who is 'better to us than our fears.' He can restrain these 'floods of ungodly men.'—He only is our sure defence.

THE CONFERENCES.

On last Wednesday the Ministers composing the Mississippi Conference met in session at Natchez, and those of the Montgomery Conference met in Opelika, Alabama. On next Wednesday the Louisiana Conference will meet in Carondelet Street Church in this city, and on the same day, the Mobile Conference will meet at Marion, Alabama. We are deeply interested in these four assemblies and wished to be present at each of them; but though separated by considerable distance they are nearly together in time—this, and sickness at home, deprives us of one of the purest pleasures of the minister's life.

The 'fellowship of the saints' was instituted by God in the golden hours of Paradise—at early morn, before the sun waxed high, the benign Father shared and heightened the sweet converse of the unfallen pair. Then afterward when separated from mankind by their sin, He yet appeared to the Patriarch and Sarah, gave them his blessing and shared their hospitality. Upon each occasion of the Divine visit the favored house, and every soul in it, must have taken in long draughts of the inspiring life, the pure love, and the joyful rapture of the Holy Presence. This sublime intercourse was re-established and became the daily privilege of men during the whole time that the Son of God remained upon earth. The Golden Age untarnished by earth did then indeed reappear! The Saviour moved about with the odor of his 'myrrh and cassia,' diffusing every where his love and peace, his health and wisdom, his life and hope. The infirm, the poor, the untaught, and the diseased watched his coming, and pressed closely upon his person. But in the circle of his immediate friends, John, Mary, Martha, Peter, James, and others of that noble band that shared his varying fortunes, his soul poured itself out. His favors, always great, were displayed in their highest excellence at the board and amid scenes sacred to friendship. Here there sprang up a new joy, like the wine of Heaven, called the 'fellowship of the saints,' which set the heart on fire, and so elevated the nature of men that they became worthy of being the 'friends of God.' To be invited to a feast where he was to be the guest was joy and honor enough. 'Will the Master be there?' If so, who could afford to be absent! To part with that companion was to the disciples only less than death. But when the final hour came, the Saviour assured them with the surprising announcement that he would 'never leave them' that he would 'go away,' but he would 'come again'—that whereas, now, he could only be in one company of his friends at a time, then he would be with all companies of them always. O, wonderful, mysterious fellowship! The glow on every heart should then become a permanent flame, and love should be the shekinah of the soul. 'That which we have seen and heard,' says the beloved disciple, 'declare we unto you, that you also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.'

'If I die,' said an old minister, 'I shall be with Him, if I live, he will be with me.' Happy soul, whether dying or living, thou art in Heaven! This 'soul-reviving feast' the Wesleyans and the early preachers always expected at their Conferences. A man would travel a thousand miles on horseback to enjoy one day of that elevating communion. In the intermediate hours, let us redeem all the time we can for private exercises, 'was part of their rule' for holding Conference. The great days of the feast, when each man received enough to go forty days in its strength, was the Conference Sacrament, and the Conference Love-feast. And it is this fellowship, with its reviving elasticity, that we Methodist Preachers now need, to meet and overcome the many depressing conditions under which we labor. All the plans of finance that were ever proposed, or attempted, cannot supply us with food: but the grace of God working upon the hearts of the people can. It is not only the sure way but the short way to solve the increasing difficulties of the present 'situation.' Poverty may lock up our people, but parsimony and care much more frequently do. Still, whatever by the will of God lies before us the coming year, we will brace ourselves with the invigorating cheer which the spirit offers us so bountifully in the sweet fellowship of kindred minds.

General Hancock.

The Commanding General, by his recent orders, is doing much toward arresting the ruin which threatens every department of industry and commerce in this District. His first order declares that the civil law is the law of the land; and on yesterday he issued an order which delivers us from Negro Juries. A few more blows in this direction will finish the folly which has made us the gazing stock of the world.

His accessibility and unpretending manners are doing nearly as much toward reviving the spirits of our community as his official course. The difficulty of reaching Generals Canby, or Sheridan, was absolutely greater than that of seeing the President, or Secretary of War, three times over. Having actually had occasion to test the fact, we speak knowingly. Indeed the conduct of Military Chieftains among us heretofore has been such as to make the profession of arms disreputable. It began to be believed that of all Americans, the officers of the Army had the least respect for those principles of liberty and human right which have ever been considered as the boast of every man who speaks the English language.

Gen Hancock Assumes Command.

It will be perceived by the following order that Gen. Hancock has assumed command of the Fifth Military District:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, La., Nov. 29, 1867.
General Orders No. 40.

I. In accordance with General Orders, No. 81, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant General's Office, Washington, D. C., August 27th, 1867, Major General W. S. Hancock hereby assumes command of the Fifth Military District, and of the Department composed of the States of Louisiana and Texas.

II. The General Commanding is gratified to learn that peace and quiet reign in this Department. It will be his purpose to preserve this condition of things. As a means to this great end he regards the maintenance of the civil authorities in the faithful execution of the laws, as the most efficient, under existing circumstances.

In war it is indispensable to repel force by force, and overthrow and destroy opposition to lawful authority. But when insurrectionary force has been overthrown, and peace established, and the civil authorities are ready and willing to perform their duties, the military power should cease to lead, and the civil administration resume its natural and rightful dominion. Solemnly impressed with these views, the General announces that the great principle of American liberty still are the lawful inheritance of this people, and ever should be. The right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech and the natural rights of persons and the rights of property must be preserved.

Free institutions, while they are essential to the prosperity and happiness of the people, always furnish the strongest inducement to peace and order. Crimes and offences committed in the District must be referred to the consideration and judgment of the regular civil tribunals, and those tribunals will be supported in their lawful jurisdiction.

Should there be violations of existing laws which are not inquired into by the civil magistrates, or should failures in the administration of justice by the courts be complained of, the cases will be reported to these Headquarters, when such orders will be made as may be deemed necessary.

While the General thus indicates his purpose to respect the liberties of the people, he wishes all to understand that armed insurrections or forcible resistance to the law will be instantly suppressed by arms.

By command of Major Gen. W. S. Hancock, W. G. Mitchell,
Bvt. Lieut. Col., Act'g Asst. Adj't General, Official: NATHANIEL BURBANK, Sec'd Lieut., 37th Inf., Bvt. First Lieut., U. S. Army, A. A. General.

In the following order Gen. Hancock announces his staff:

II. Until the return of the Assistant Adjutant General of the District, Brevet Lieutenant Colonel W. G. Mitchell will perform the duties of that office.

III. Captain Robert Chandler, 13th U. S. Infantry, and Captain Charles G. Cox, 10th U. S. Cavalry, are hereby announced as Assistant Secretaries for Civil Affairs at these Headquarters.

IMPORTANT ORDER.

THE LEVEE QUESTION.—We are pleased to learn, says the Times, that another attempt will be made to master the difficulties of the levee question, at least so far as the neighboring parishes are concerned. In case of an overflow on the left bank, at any of the threatened points above the city, the Jackson Railroad would be endangered, and a community of interest as well as a common danger, induced Gen. Beauregard to consult with the riparian proprietors and parish juries in order to agree, if possible, on some available measure of protection. The result has been an offer on the part of the Railroad Company to make the necessary repairs at the low rate of thirty-five cents per cubic yard. Thus far, however, the proposition has not been accepted, and the danger increases with every day's delay. The attention of Gen. Hancock has been called to the subject, and he has issued an order, of which the following is an extract:

It having been satisfactorily proven that there is the most urgent necessity for building levees on the plantations of Sarpy and Alex, in the parish of St. Charles, and of the Save Plantation, parish of Jefferson, Louisiana, left bank of the river, and that the police jury, as well as the planters of said parishes, have neglected to take the necessary steps to have said work performed, it is ordered that the ming of said levees be adjudicated, submitted to plans and specifications, submitted by J. J. Conway, Surveyor, on file at these Headquarters, the lowest bidder, by Brevet Lieutenant Colonel A. J. McGonigle, Assistant Quartermaster, on Tuesday the 10th of December, inst., at 11 o'clock, the bid to be so improved, completed in time and manner to furnish protection from overflow, and the lands, with the improvement thereon, be subject to a special and privilege for the costs of building said levees on their respective parishes, and that the ordinary form prescribed by law for the adjunction of said work, be dispensed with.

By command of Major General Hancock:
W. G. Mitchell,
Brevet Lieut. Col., A. A. G.

By special orders No. 202, P. O'Rourke is reinstated as clerk of Second District Court, Parish Orleans, and R. L. Shelley is moved.

Special Order 201 removes G. Mower—as below:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, La., December 3, 1867.
Special Orders No. 201.
[Extract.]

Lieut. Col. Wm. H. Wood, 1st U. S. Inf., will, without unnecessary delay, relieve, temporarily, Brev. Major Gen. Joseph A. Mower, 39th U. S. Inf., from duty as Commander of the District of Louisiana, embracing the State of Louisiana, and the posts of Marshall, Jefferson, Texas, and Ship Island, Miss.

Lieut. Col. Wood will also relieve Gen. Mower, temporarily, from duty as Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, for the State of Louisiana. Upon being relieved from duty as above required, Brev. Major Gen. Mower will proceed to join headquarters of his regiment, which will be established at Gretna, Louisiana.

By command of Major Gen. Hancock:
W. G. Mitchell,
Bvt. Lieut. Col., A. A. G., Official: NATHANIEL BURBANK, 2d Lieut., 37th Inf., Bvt. 1st Lieut., U. S. Army, A. A. G.

By command of Major Gen. Hancock:

Revocation of Gen. Sheridan's Jury Order.

NO MORE NEGROES ON JURIES.

The following order, just issued by Gen. Hancock, is so important that we hasten to lay it before the public:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, La., Dec. 6, 1867.
Special Orders No. 203.
[Extract.]

2. The true and proper use of military power, besides defending the National Honor against Foreign Nations, is to uphold the laws of Civil Government, and to secure every person residing among us the enjoyment of life, liberty and property. It is accordingly made, act of Congress, the duty of the Commander of this District, to protect all persons in those rights, suppress disorder and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the peace and criminals. The Commanding General has been officially informed that the administration of justice, and especially of criminal justice, in

OBITUARIES.

Rev. JOHN J. ROBERTSON, was born in Sumter District, South Carolina, Nov. 16th, 1787, and died in Jefferson county, Miss., Nov. 8th, 1867, being with in eight days of eighty years old, and in the sixtieth year of his Christian pilgrimage.

In the fall of 1801, his parents moved to the Mississippi Territory, and in the following spring his father died, leaving him, then in his fifteenth year—he being the oldest son—in charge of his mother with five other children. In 1804, the family was able to enter and settle the tract of land upon which he lived until his death. In June, 1808, he joined the M. E. Church, as a seeker of religion, and in the following autumn, he knelt in deep penitence at a camp-meeting altar, and while Peggy Dow, wife of the celebrated Lorenzo Dow, was leading in prayer he was gloriously converted. The writer has often heard him refer to this incident as an additional evidence why the sisterhood of the church should take an active part in our revival meetings. Throughout his entire religious course, he was one of the best examples of Christian and official fidelity I have ever known. Without the prestige of education, or property, he commenced the struggle of life with a heavy burden on his young heart and hands, but most creditably did he support his widowed mother and her children until they were otherwise provided for. On the 13th of February, 1821, he was united in marriage to Miss Jane Baldridge, who engaged with him earnestly in the service of God, and journeyed with him heavenward, until the other day, she saw his body laid in the grave. They reared six children to man and womanhood, all of whom, early in life, became members of the Church, and one of whom is a minister—Rev. F. B. Robertson of the Miss. Conference. They also raised a number of orphaned relations, all of whom I believe, professed religion while young. This godly couple, by christian industry and frugality, not only supported their large family in credit, but had acquired a handsome estate, until deprived of most of it by the results of the late war.

But it is the Christian and ministerial character of father Robertson, that I wish to emphasize mostly, for it is in that we see how a man with many early disadvantages—by faithful continuance in well-doing—may rise from obscurity to prominence and usefulness in the Church. Soon after his conversion—as was then the universal practice among the Methodists—he was called on to take part in the social prayer-meetings of the Church, and he soon manifested superior talents as a prayer-leader. Then he was appointed class leader, which office he filled at various periods in different places with marked acceptability. In leading his prayer and class-meetings, he soon exhibited gifts in the way of exhortation which promised much usefulness to the Church and community, and he was licensed to exhort. He was naturally modest and diffident, and never primarily sought any office at the hands of the Church, but when the voice of the Church in connection with that of an approving conscience, bade him go forward, he unhesitatingly went. His improving and useful gifts as an exhorter, suggested that he ought to be licensed to preach, and being duly recommended by the Church of which he had been a member for more than twenty years, he was licensed to preach, August, 25th 1832, and graduated in due time to Deacons and Elders orders. In 1838, he was admitted into the Mississippi Conference, and was for several years a zealous, laborious, and useful itinerant preacher, until his advanced age and domestic circumstances indicated that he ought to resume his position as a local Elder. The remainder of his life was spent in looking after all the interests of the Church within his reach, until entirely disabled by the diseases and infirmities of extreme old age. He was devoted to the standard books and periodical literature of our Church, and, as a Methodist, was more than ordinarily intelligent. His domestic rules were simple and scriptural, and religion was beautifully exemplified in his family.

For several years previous to death, he was closely confined by bodily affliction, and for the last year was quite helpless, but he was strong in faith and hope, love and patience, and descended gracefully and happily to the tomb. In his very last moments of consciousness he was full of joy and holy triumph. "Tell my numerous friends," said he, "all is well with me!" The writer preached his funeral to a large audience before interment, and we all felt that we had met to bury one of the best of our race.

[Extract.]
1. In accordance with the written agreement made and entered into between the Acting General Superintendent of Educational Department, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, and the Board of Directors of Public Schools in the City of New Orleans, Louisiana, the Educational Department will THIS DAY turn over to the owners, or lessors, all buildings leased for the use of Schools established under the auspices of this Bureau for the children of freed people.

Secure Profitable Investment.
THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD First Mortgage, Thirty-Year Six Per Cent Coupon Bonds.

Principal and Interest Payable in Gold Coin.
Represent the preferred claim upon one of the most important lines of communication in the world, as it is the sole link between the Pacific Coast and the Great Interior Basin, over which the immense overland travel must pass, and the MAIN TRUNK LINE ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

The Road is now nearly completed from Sacramento to the Richest Mining Regions in the Salt Lake Basin, and is being rapidly carried forward by the largest force of laborers ever employed by any Railroad Company on this continent.

The natural, legitimate, commercial business of the road surpasses all previous expectations, and is profitable beyond parallel, even among the oldest roads in existence. The earnings and expenses for the Quarter ending Oct 31, were as follows, in GOLD:

| Gross Earnings | Operating Expenses | Net Earnings |
|----------------|--------------------|--------------|
| $593,847.92 | $102,088.61 | $491,759.31 |

This result, however, would have been far greater but for the inability of wagon teams to forward the freight and passengers from the temporary terminus in the mountains.

The United States Government and the State and Cities of California have so aided and fostered the Great Enterprise, that the Company will assume very light annual interest obligations, and will have the following ample Resources at command for the Construction:

|-----------------------------------|--------------|
| Capital Stock, Net Earnings, etc. | $12,800,000 | | (no lien) | 11,000,000 |
| Loans (subordinate lien) | 3,000,000 | | U. S. Subsidy Bonds, etc. | 25,517,000 | | First Mortgage Bonds | 25,517,000 |
| Resources, first 726 miles. | $75,834,000 |

THE FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS are in sums of $1,000 each, with semi-annual gold coupons attached, and are offered for sale, for the present, at 95 per cent, and accrued interest from July 1st, in currency, at which rate they yield nearly NINE PER CENT. UPON THE INVESTMENT.

These Bonds, authorized by the Pacific Railroad Act of Congress, are issued only as the work progresses, and to the same extent only as the Bonds granted by the Government, and are the prior lien upon the whole valuable property furnished by the above Resources. They possess special assurances and advantages over other Corporate Securities, and are destined to rank among THE BEST INVESTMENTS IN THE WORLD, from their unusual attractions of safety, soundness, and profit.

Central Pacific First Mortgage Bonds, now realize for the holders from 12 to 18 per cent. Advantage, with the same rate of interest.

Bonds can be obtained through the subscribers directly, or through responsible Banking agencies.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

HARPER'S BAZAR, the publication of which has just been commenced by HARPER & BROTHERS, is an illustrated Weekly Journal, devoted to Fashion and Household Literature.

It is the first Weekly Journal of Fashion ever published in the United States. By arrangements which the Publishers have perfected, at great cost, with the most celebrated European Fashion Journals—particularly with the well-known Bazar of Berlin—illustrations of Fashion for a week of the year will appear in HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being their publication in Paris and Berlin, and in advantage which will belong exclusively to this Journal.

In a country where Three Hundred Millions of Dollars are annually expended for dress-goods, and where the most elaborate and costly articles become of the greatest value to American women, the BAZAR will contain full and explicit instructions, with illustrations, which will enable every Lady Reader to cut and make her own and her children's entire wardrobe with a large portion of her husband's Each alternate Number will be accompanied with large Pattern Plates, containing from Forty to Fifty full-sized Patterns, applicable to every article of wardrobe for cutting and making. Similar illustrations and Descriptions of Fancy Work will also be furnished. These Patterns will be executed in Paris and Berlin, and will surpass any thing of the kind hitherto produced in this country. Freshness and elegant Colored Fashion Plate will be presented with the paper. Practical Descriptions will also be given of the Fashions especially in vogue in New York, the centre of fashion in America.

HARPER'S BAZAR, besides being the leading Fashion Journal in this country, will also aim to present before its readers the very best specimens of Household Literature. It will contain original and selected Serial Stories, Poetry, Novels, Articles on the Topics of the Day (excluding Politics), on Books, Art, Music, Science, Education, Amusement, Hygiene, Etiquette, Housekeeping, Gardening, with foreign and foreign gossip. No subject of household interest will be excluded from its columns.

In the first Number of the BAZAR will be commenced a Novel entitled "The Crest and the Cross," or "The Branden Mystery," by James De Mille, Esq., Author of "The Dodge Club." This Novel has been read in manuscript by several of our most competent critics, who unanimously pronounce it, in point of interest of plot, variety of adventure, and graphic delineation of character, to be fully equal to any of the novels of Wilkie Collins.

HARPER'S BAZAR will contain 16 folio pages, of the centre of fashion in America. Every copy of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superior calendered paper, and will be published weekly, at ten cents per single Number, for Four Dollars per Year.

Ladies in the country will be supplied gratuitously through the mails with the first Six Numbers of HARPER'S BAZAR upon written application to the Publishers.

Postage, Five Cents for Three Months. Single Subscribers will be supplied from the beginning to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of Four Dollars.

An Extra Copy will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers, at Four Dollars each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for Twenty Dollars.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The general market has exhibited rather more animation since our last issue, but still the wholesale trade is far from showing its usual activity. Our leading staple has continued in active request. In fact, the receipts are generally disposed of as soon as sampled. Prices, however, have further given way under unfavorable accounts from New York and Liverpool and a decline in foreign exchange. Sugar and Molasses have met a moderate demand at about previous rates. Nothing of any moment has been done in Tobacco; and operations in Western Produce have been of limited extent, without any material variation in prices.

COTTON.—We noticed in our last report that the market closed on Friday at 14 to 14½ for Good Ordinary, 14½ to 15 for Low Middling, 15½ to 15¾ for Middling, and 16 to — for Strict Middling, since which the movement has been to a fair extent, but, under the influence of unfavorable accounts from Liverpool and New York, prices have given way fully ½c. On Saturday, at the opening of business, the enquiry appeared to be only moderate, but towards noon the demand was stimulated by reports that telegrams had been received noting an advance of ¼d to ½d at Liverpool, and on the strength of these rumors factors enhanced their pretensions, and in some cases realized an advance of ½ to ¾c, but at a later hour it appeared that the reports referred to were without foundation, and the telegrams which actually came to hand noted a decline of 1-16d, instead of an advance. Prices, nevertheless, were on the whole manifestly firmer and the sales summed up 4500 bales. On Monday the same confident feeling was entertained by factors who were reluctant to meet the demand at the concessions claimed by buyers, but later in the day the former met the demand more freely, and the business comprised 3400 bales, at irregular prices, showing, in many cases, a falling off of ½ to ¾c, and in others no material change, the market closing heavy at inside figures. Tuesday the prospect at the opening of business was not favorable to a large business. The supply offering was moderate, many buyers had withdrawn in consequence of their orders being cancelled, and others were unable to go on unless at reduced rates. At a later hour, however, factors were compelled to yield, and meeting the demand more freely, the movement became quite active, resulting in sales of 5350 bales, which is the largest business on record this season.

The receipts proper since Friday evening embrace 11445 bales, against 14179 during the corresponding period last week showing an increase of 2734 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 117,872 bales, against 209,445 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 8,009 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 1,309 bales to Great Britain, of 6778 to France, and an increase of 25,114 to other foreign ports.

We now reduce our quotations as follows:

SUGAR.—The demand continues good, at full prices, and the receipts sell quite readily.

MOLASSES.—The demand was fair on Saturday and Monday, but at prices ruling in favor of buyers.

FLOUR.—The market has continued extremely dull since our last review. The dealers are well supplied and there is very little demand for shipment.

CORN.—The market is quiet but firm.

OATS.—Have been more in request and prices have advanced 2c per bushel since our last review.

PORK.—The market is quiet but firm with a fair demand for dealers trade, and prices have further advanced about 25c per bbl since our last review.

BACON.—Extreme dullness continues to prevail and only a retail business is doing.

THE BEST ARE THE CHEAPEST.
THE MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS have just been awarded a FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the Grand Exposition in Paris, in competition with instruments from the best makers of all countries. This makes over seven, to highest premiums awarded them within a few years. Testimonials from more than three hundred of the most prominent musicians in the country that these instruments are unequalled are published in the circulars of Mason & Hamlin.

Observe that dealers in musical instruments are strongly tempted to recommend "equal to the best," those instruments on which they can make the largest profit. The prices of M. & H. are fixed and invariable. They cannot afford the large discounts made by manufacturers of inferior work, many of whom sell at 40 to 50 per cent discount.

At the prices at which they are sold, the Mason & Hamlin Organs are believed to be not only the best but the cheapest instruments of their class. Send for circular, with particulars, to MASON & HAMLIN, 596 Broadway, N. Y., or 154 Tremont street, Boston.

William Mason & E. S. Hoadly's New Method for the Pianoforte.
 Already a second edition of this new work is ready and nearly sold in advance. It is new in method and matter, embracing modern exercises and expedients not heretofore presented, while its selection of Exercises, Recreations, and Pieces, mostly from composers of recognized eminence, is unusually large and very choice.

This is the first instruction book to include the technicals of modern pianoforte playing. It has a full elucidation and illustration of Mr. Mason's new system of Accidental Treatment of Exercises, by which the attention of the pupil is almost compelled, and careless practice is rendered nearly impossible, while not only the hands, but also the mind, taste, and artistic perceptions are cultivated and trained.

It is eminently a practical work, the result of long and most successful experience in the actual business of pianoforte teaching. It is carefully progressive, very clear and perspicuous and full in its explanations and directions, illustrated by cuts and diagrams, and is adapted to the use of young beginners as well as of those who have made progress 240 pp large 4to. Price $4. Two editions are published; one with American and one with European Fingering. Care should be taken to designate which is wanted. The Christians of Madagascar.

A more astounding event followed. Hitherto suits at law were argued before twelve judges, who appear to have exercised the functions of judge and jury together, with a final appeal to the King. The King now announced his intention to issue a proclamation that, after a certain date, all such suits were to be decided by battle, and that, in these judicial combats, it should be lawful for a man to kill his adversary. The announcement, emanating from a monarch hitherto recognized for his humanity, love of progress, and strong personal interest in the welfare of his people, appears to have come like a thunderclap on the land. Mr. Ellis boldly asserts that his royal pupil had lost his senses. From that hour, the Menamaso—to whom the whole was attributed—appear to have been doomed to destruction. On the morning of the day which was to witness the publication of this extraordinary edict at Zoma the great market-place of the capital, there was a meeting at the residence of the Chief Minister; and a long procession of nobles, clad in the graceful native lamba, wended its way, silent and thoughtful, through the streets of the metropolis to the palace, to make a last appeal to the King. Two hours afterwards, it was seen returning, more silent and more thoughtful still. The King had been obdurate; and replied, "I will not take off my law—it will do good for my country." It is even added that the Chief Minister knelt to him before the assembled nobles, but without effect. Then—so ran report—the Chief Minister rose, and calling on the nobles to bear witness to his words, asked the King, was it to be war with the Menamaso? to which the King replied, "Go—arm yourselves!"

Mr. Ellis's last interview with the King, on this eventful day, is of interest, for the light it throws on some previous matters to which we have alluded:—

"Thinking it right to go to the King again that day, in the hope that some opportunity might occur of speaking a word in favor of peace, yet not wishing to be out so late as usual, I went at two o'clock, instead of three; in the afternoon I found the King sitting in a room with two Catholic priests; and, among others who were present, was the man who, as I was afterwards told, was the leader of the party who had laid the death-tokens at my door, and intended to do what those tokens indicated, though I was ignorant of anything of the kind at the time. I asked Radama if he wished to read, and as he answered in the affirmative and rose to go out, I followed him into the room in which we usually read together. There I delivered to him a roll of specimen lithographs of places and scenes in Madagascar which I had that morning received for him from Lieutenant Oliver. As I sat down beside him, and opened the book, the two priests came in and sat down, and as we were about to begin, Pere Finaz said, "I have a little business." On which I proposed to retire. The priest remarked that it was only a very short paper which he wished to read. I said to the King, "If it is very short I will stay, otherwise I must go." The priest then drew a pamphlet from under his dress, and began to speak in a very inarticulate and confused manner about something I had said on a former occasion in reference to Father Jone, pointing to the pamphlet. Interrupting him, I said, "Not now. I have not time to hear or say anything about that now—another day," and turning to the King, I said, "If your Majesty pleases, I will retire; I have business at home." The priest still urging that it would not be long, the King exclaimed, "He says another time." I then hastily shook hands with the King, bowed to the priests, and left the room, apparently much to their surprise.

Such was their last meeting. In the meantime, the Ministerial party—Ministerial, of late, only in name—were by no means inactive. On returning to the house of the Chief Minister, they drew up a formal indictment against the Menamaso; and, without separating, passed a resolution of death against the entire body. The army they still possessed, its commander-in-chief being of the Ministerial party, and acting in concert with his brother, the Chief Minister. Their arrangements with regard to the troops appear to have been prompt, vigorous, and highly effective. Before sunset, every approach to the capital was garrisoned, without confusion or disorder. It is estimated that 20,000 soldiers were assembled in and around the city of a thousand

* Such are the words attributed to the King in a native version of the transaction by the Ministry, Commander-in-Chief, and brother of the Chief Minister, himself present on the occasion. Mr. Ellis's visits to the palace appear, at this period, to have been wholly restricted to the reading lessons.

submit, with scarcely any appearance of movement. So unexpectedly came the whole manoeuvre on the Menamaso, that none of them appear to have had the least intimation until the messengers of death, armed with the fatal spear, stood before each. Ten fell on the public thoroughfare—in their houses—at their places of business; and, as they fell, their bodies lay untouched till the shades of night permitted their removal. One barely found time to spring upon the back of a swift horse, and escape to the depths of the native forest. Thirty-three fled toward the palace, and were received within its walls by the King, who hastened to the gate to meet them. By evening, the whole of the Menamaso were either dead, virtual prisoners, or hopeless fugitives. Not the least extraordinary part of this purely native movement was the absolute order and security of property which marked the scene of it. No private citizen was interfered with; no private house was entered, the very gardens were not trampled upon. With the morning, the Menamaso who had taken refuge in the palace were demanded of the King. Radama refused—expostulated—and, at length, consented to surrender them on condition that their lives should be spared. Exile in chains was the most lenient commutation of sentence which the King was able to obtain on their behalf from the Ministerial party; and they were led off to Zoma to have their chains affixed. Europeans who witnessed the sad procession were struck by its singularly melancholy aspect. The Menamaso had been stripped of their gay ornaments; incessant rain poured on their bare heads, and streamed down the few garments left to them; and, during the whole way, they lifted not their eyes from the ground. Arrived at Zoma, while their chains were being affixed, the spearmen fell upon them, and in a few moments they ceased to live.

Nor was the revolutionary movement to stop here. At midnight, two nobles presented themselves at the palace, and sought admission to the King. It was replied that he was asleep, and could not be disturbed. They repeated their visit an hour later, with the like result. With early dawn, they again presented themselves, accompanied by a few followers. They effected an entrance—broke into the King's apartment—and dragged him from his bed. The Queen interposed with cries, and promises that their demands would be satisfied—Radama would yield—they could depose him—both would retire from the capital; with difficulty she was forced from the apartment. The young monarch is stated to have met his end with dignity. "I have never shed human blood," were the last words uttered by him as the fatal napkin stifled all further speech. His body, by inexorable native usage dealt to criminals, lay unmoved until nightfall. Under the covering of night, it was stolen out of the city, and consigned to earth. With such extreme secrecy were these unhonored rites conducted as to give occasion to subsequent rumors that Radama still lived.

So perished a ruler whose accession to the throne, but a twelvemonth before, was, to his own countrymen, as the sun rising on the dark and terrible night of his mother's cruel reign—an event which Europe had awaited, not without impatience, as the termination to deeds shocking to humanity. With all the causes tending to produce so singular a reverse of fortune, we may, perhaps, never become fully acquainted; but we are forced to regard a wild and unreasoning fear of foreign subjugation—a feeling that, under the new reforms, a European power was growing up in the midst of the land, as lying most largely at the bottom of the movement. No doubt, the extraordinary edict of the King legalizing ordeal by battle precipitated matters; but, with the concessions to the French Company, and more especially those alienating native territory, the King appears to us to have sealed his doom. M. Lambert had sailed for France to organize his Company, in accordance with the terms of his treaty; and his arrival was now daily expected, in a French man-of-war, on the coast. In the meantime, the name of the late King was removed from the list of native sovereigns which it is customary to recite on all solemn occasions—the new ruler ascended the throne as the immediate successor of Ranavaloa—and to assert that Radama still lived, even to repeat his name, was proclaimed a capital offence.

The character of this ill-fated monarch cannot but be accounted singular. The growth to maturity of many noble and highly prepossessing qualities amid the strangely uncongenial atmosphere of his mother's court evinces no ordinary originality and independence of mind. His love of social pleasures made frivolous the later months of his reign; nor can they be freed from graver charges of folly and dissipation. His natural gaiety and quick sensibilities greatly heightened the effects of wine, and he was easily intoxicated. But his detestation of cruelty, his kindly affection, his freedom from all malice, and his unfailing sympathy with all that ennobles or makes truly great, remained undimmed to the close.

The Crown was now offered by the Ministerial party, without delay, to the Queen; by whom it was accepted. Rabodo was of royal birth, and was, perhaps, the next heir to the throne; but on the present occasion—the first, it is stated, in the history of the country—it was made a condition that she ascended it by the will of the people. Other conditions were also added. Capital punishment was to be again in force, but without the Tangana.* Customs duties were to be resumed; and a form of trial more nearly approaching that by jury was established. Religious tolerance was to be continued, and foreign commerce encouraged. In accordance with native usage, the Queen adopted the reigning title of Rasoberina; under which name she has since continued to exercise sovereign power.

It was not without considerable anxiety the native Christians witnessed these revolutionary changes. No time, however, appears to have been lost by the Ministerial party in making intimation to the missionaries that the movement would in no way affect their position in the country; and a similar assurance was repeated on the occasion of a public interview with the new sovereign, to which they were invited. In a few weeks, complete confidence returned, and the attendance at the several places of public religious worship resumed its former appearance. Subsequently the Queen accorded a public reception to her Christian subjects; on which occasion, Mr. Ellis estimates that more than 7,000 were in attendance, including several nobles and officers of high rank. Their number and appearance—by no means inconsiderable, if we take into account that little more than a twelvemonth had elapsed since a period was put to a series of most cruel and relentless persecutions—seem to have given rise to some surprise, but no expression of alarm or displeasure was made. In 1865, opportunity was taken of an amended form of the English treaty to introduce a clause guaranteeing full religious liberty to all native Christians. The importance of such a safeguard, thus forming portion of a solemn international treaty, is greater than might at first sight appear; and should a desire for Christian persecution again arise, the traditional native policy would hesitate before breaking with a European Power. The number of native Christians in the capital and its immediate neighborhood is now estimated at 18,000, distributed among seventy-nine churches, under care of seven English missionaries, and ninety-five native pastors and teachers. There are also twenty schools, including a training school in full working order, with preparations to enlarge this portion of missionary work. This estimate is compressed within a radius of twenty miles from the capital, and is exclusive of distant and more scattered fields of Christian labor.

With such brief and necessarily imperfect record, we now take our leave of this most interesting subject. Our readers will have already learned that nowhere, in modern times, has Christianity so fearlessly and so successfully grappled with brutal superstition and heathen fanaticism. But the earlier intercourse of civilization with barbarism is at all times, and under all circumstances, perilous to the latter; and, during some succeeding years, the course of Malagasy progress must be watched with solicitude. Any considerable relapse from Christianity we regard as unlikely. The people have shown themselves peculiarly fitted for its intelligent and permanent reception, and those fierce storms of religious persecution which might nipturn a more weakly growth have only sent its roots deeper into the soil.

* Not the least remarkable characteristic of this peculiar native ordeal is the hold which it appears to exercise over the country. As a test of guilt or innocence, it is most barbarous and contemptible in the extreme. Nevertheless, though thus excluded from Malagasy courts of justice by royal edict—an exclusion sought to be further confirmed by a distinct article of the subsequent English treaty of 1865—many of the more intelligent and better educated nobles have expressed desire for its re-introduction. This, as well as the unfortunate proclamation of the King, legalizing ordeal by combat, would seem to point to considerable difficulties in the course of Malagasy justice.

That the wicked have peace in themselves is no wonder; they are as sure as temptation can make them. No prince makes war with his own subjects. The godly are still enemies, therefore they must look to be assaulted both by stratagem and violence. Nothing shall more joy me than my inward quietness. A just war is a thousand times more happy than an ill conditioned peace.

The Political Prisons of Rome.

Sometimes, though but seldom, I am fortunate enough to get an invitation to a Palazzo, or even to the Vatican, but not to the gorgeous apartments on the principal floor, where the noble guard may be seen assembled in the ante-room—not to eat of the meal of that trembling, miserable old man, who looks hesitatingly at every dish, and often will not partake of the simplest food till he has seen half of it catch before him.

He may lift his three fingers to a kneeling city, with the ever-repeated "Urbi et orbi" (to the city, to the world): is there no benediction that will exorcise that phantom, causeless fear? Is there no blessing that will extend to his own meal? He is struck senseless in the basilica, and carried by lackeys to his apartments; the oft-repeated rote, has so impressed itself on his brain that, in his fatuity, thinking he is addressing the populace, he lifts the three fingers, and drones forth "Urbi et orbi." Cannot he participate in his own benediction? Cannot he partake of the gifts of that beneficent Providence he assumes to represent without peeping to see if Death is in that pottage? No, I will not dine with him, though the three fingers and the droning voice be raised for my especial behoof.

"Urbi et orbi." Is there no spot, between the city and the wide world beyond, on which that benediction may alight? Cannot it rest on that pestilential marsh in the angle between the Tiber and the sea, where the atmosphere is so deadly that delinquent priests and others, whom it may be convenient to remove without the scandal of a public execution, are sent to the death that a few months will certainly bring? Not that angle on the Southern side of the river, where lies Ostia,—that is bad enough, Heaven knows! still life may, under some favorable conditions, be sustained there,—but that empty angle on the northern bank, lying to the left of the road to Civita Vecchia, and where you may see the chained and dying convicts crawling to their daily work,—one or two of them, perhaps, to drop on the road, and never to return,—and the pale spectre of a man in the priestly garb, ostensibly there in the discharge of spiritual functions to the chained convicts, but in fact their companion and fellow-prisoner.

He, poor wretch, had no vocation for his office; he took upon himself the vows that he was unable to fulfil, and circumstances being against him,—probably also an influential family,—he has been thus doomed. Cannot the benediction rest on this deadly marsh? Yes. The strange, unearthly visage; the trembling limb; the shrunken form,—mark its presence for the first six months: then the burning fever; the swollen, protruding tongue; the joints racked by neuralgia; and afterwards, the paralyzed limb; the seared brain; and "Urbi et orbi," not from those three fingers, but that thrice-blessed benediction that Heaven sends on all alike.

This part of the Maremma is marked by characteristics peculiar to itself. On the eastern side rises a long range of up-land country, the sides of which are covered with verdure of a luxuriance amounting to wildness. On the other side, to an extent almost as far as the eye can reach, stretch out long flats of land as level as the surface of a lake, with scarcely a sign of human habitation, or a tree to break the sullen uniformity of the landscape.

In the extreme distance, the intensely blue sea, studded with glittering, fairy-like islands, seems to sleep as still and quiet as the blue sky above. Perhaps the most striking characteristic of the place is its silent, death-like stillness.—You may pass for days through the country, and not hear a sound or see a human being, unless you chance to light upon a gang of chained convicts, employed in mending the single road that traverses the district. The effect of this strange stillness is yet further enhanced by the almost utter absence of towns, villages, or human habitations; sometimes you seem to be approaching a hamlet or a collection of huts, but on coming nearer it proves to be the crumbling ruins of an ancient city, the very name of which has passed away, or perhaps a cluster of Etruscan sepulchres. This absence of all signs of living beings, added to a consciousness of the pestilential nature of the atmosphere, exerts a peculiar influence on the imagination,—one seems to be treading some region of romance or ideal land of the poets, rather than the surface of the living, moving, working day world. Yet this place, so pestilential, so deserted, is still the most fertile, and at one time must have been the most populous, in Italy. Continually do you come upon ruins that mark the sites of what were once the chief cities of their respective kingdoms,—the ancient Etruscan capitals of Canose, Cornuto, and Cera, may all be passed in the compass of a moderate day's walk.

Many years since, when, in fact, quite a boy, I wandered alone over this district (I was on a walking expedition to Italy, and on leaving Viterbo, a distance of some sixty miles from the Eternal City, I took the wrong road, and continued in it till I found myself in the desert,—through which I found my way, sleeping on the ground at night, and subsisting on what provisions I had with me), in four days, to Rome. I was led to revisit the place, partly to revive the reminiscences of my boyhood, and partly in search of an unopened tumuli, belonging to the ancient Etruscans, and the races that preceded them. Being aware that the convict establishment was to be found in some secluded corner of the country, I determined to explore it as far as might be practicable. I had heard that the place was rigidly guarded, to prevent all access or escape; and so indeed it proved to be, for after skirting the marshy district (that, I rightly concluded, must be the place I was in search of) for some miles, I found every pathway leading into it effectually stopped, either by masonry or impenetrable fencing, and all attempts to get across the country in other places rendered abortive by deep cuttings, filled with marsh-water.—The country was flat, dreary, and uninviting in the extreme, its chief feature being the extensive pools of black, stagnant water that give to the place the name of the Stagno de Macerese. Above, the sky was without a cloud, and the heat of the blazing midsummer sun was almost tropical in its intensity.

After skirting the enclosed land for two or three miles, I could see at the distance of about half a mile, a range of low huts, and occasionally, when the hedges permitted it, several moving figures, engaged apparently in some occupation in the ditches, and one of them appeared to be keeping a breast of me, and observing my movements, at a point somewhat near. I continued to walk in the same direction till I came upon a path leading directly into the marsh, and towards the low line of cottages mentioned above. It was what I had long been in search of; but on my essaying to enter, I was stopped by a man armed with a carbine, demanding my business. Not being able to give a very explicit answer to his imperative "Così volete," and being told by him that I was trespassing in being even where I was, I had no option but to change my course. Not feeling inclined to return by the path I had already traversed, I took a direction that would, after a couple of hours' walking, bring me on the road to Palo, at which place I should find a conveyance to Civita Vecchia. After proceeding about a quarter of a mile, I came to a rough shed, or rather, a wall of upright planks, with a sloping roof, and a bench beneath, something like what may be seen in the smaller railway stations.—The place offering a shelter from the burning midday sun, I gladly availed myself of the advantages it afforded for a rest, and for discussing the contents of my canteen.

After being seated for about five minutes, I was interrupted by the entrance of a man carrying a small sack. After putting it down, and wishing me the usual "good day," he proceeded to inspect me with that inquiring look which seems to say, "How did you get here, and what on earth do you want?" In dealing with the lower order of Italians, no manner will do unless it is perfectly unheeded and self-possessed; so, beyond returning the salutation, I took no notice of the man's presence. In a few minutes a peculiar clanking sound made me aware of the approach of a gang of chained convicts, who, in another moment, came into the shed, and, ranging themselves along the bench, obliged me to vacate my place. While this was going on the man opened the sack, and with a wooden ladle to portion off to each his share of the raw beans that formed its contents,—the poor starved wretches holding in turn their hollowed joined hands for their respective portions. After the beans had been allotted, about a ladleful remained at the bottom, which overseer was apparently desirous of taking away unobserved. This, however, he was not successful in doing, as the moment he twisted the sack, the whole gang set up such an unanimous yelling as to fail to untwist it again, and distribute the remainder.

These convicts, who, by the elements brought with them, evidently employed in menial the first period of their sentence or were selected from those whose constitutions do not readily succumb to the endemic of the place, as, with the exception of one of them, who seemed to loathe his food, though there were unmistakable signs of the fever visible in their countenances, they were still able to work, as it appeared, to eat. I, have just described made leave off my own meal, and could not bring myself to eat sandwiches in the midst of the gory, hankering glances of lookers-on; so, after a few minutes, I recommenced my walk, had not proceeded above two hundred paces, when I perceived a person who appeared to belong to the prison, and who, as far as I could tell, was engaged in eating some as he walked, which he put on any approach. His faded garments and feeble manner made the poor man's appearance miserable in the extreme; a coming nearer, it was plain to discern, from the attenuated features, the sunken, yellow cheek, and staring eyes, that the fever had proceeded far on its deadly mission. The general solitude of the country rendering a salutary some sort almost a matter of mon politeness, I accosted and endeavored to open a conversation. He was not, however, disposed to be communicative, content rather from a kind of listlessness that seemed to have invaded his faculties than from any disinclination.

The next morning I breakfasted in Civita Vecchia. From cause it proceeds I know not this town, though situated in contiguity to the worst part of the Maremma, enjoys a comparative immunity from the fever. FARADAY.—Of this distinguished votary of science, the London Times says, in the issue of Sept. 6:—"Faraday may be regarded as a type and model—far as anything human can be—of a faultless—of the scientific worker. Unfaltering in his devotion to science, following the light of wherever it led—turning, at a right hand nor to the left—to theory and disdaining practical—he maintained from first to last a devout and reverential respect was the member of a small nation, peculiar for its culture, and spiritual religion, which retained the essentials of Christianity, dispenses, more perhaps than any wise or needful, with the trappings of ecclesiasticism. In this connection, Faraday, while pursuing his life-long devotion his investigations in physical science, preserved the sanctuary of his own nature.

Finding in the religion of Christ all that, as a spiritual man, he required, he was never disturbed by any sense of discordance between the Word and the Word of God, nor could it ever be said of him, as it can, we fear, be said of not a few men eminent in science in our day, that the science they seemed to cultivate was the truth of revelation would be positive recommendation of eyes, and lead him to overlook slurs over gaps in its indications. There is a "witchery of new notions" which men are apt to fall for the love of truth for its sake; there is a feverish social paradox, which infects the sensuousness of the intellect, and there is a foppish affectation, which sneers at earnest religion as superstitious. Above all these errors and follies of our time Faraday calmly triumphant, and in impartiality, penetration, and insight as a man of science, he also as a man of God.

The path of the just is shining light, that shineth and more unto the perfect day, way of the wicked is as darkness, they know not at what they do.

AGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

of the Senate and of Representatives. The organization of the Union, which the President has so often called to the attention of Congress, is a subject of profound and patriotic concern. We may, however, find relief from the anxiety in reflection that the painful political situation, although before us, is not now in the hands of ourselves, is not now in the hands of ourselves, is not now in the hands of ourselves.

On this momentous question, and some of the measures growing out of it, I had the misfortune to differ from Congress, and have expressed my conviction without reserve, though with becoming deference to the opinion of the legislative department. Those convictions were not only unchanged, but strengthened, by subsequent events and further reflection. The transcendent importance of the subject was a sufficient excuse for calling your attention to some of the reasons which have so strongly influenced my own judgment. The hope that we may all finally concur in a mode of settlement consistent at once with our true interests and with our sworn duties to the Constitution, is too natural and too just to be easily relinquished.

AN OLD ARGUMENT.

It is clear to my apprehension that the States lately in rebellion are still members of the National Union. When did they cease to be so? Ordinances of secession, adopted by a portion [in most of them a very small portion] of their citizens, were mere nullities. If we admit now that they were valid and effectual for the purpose intended by their authors, we sweep from under our feet the whole ground upon which we justified the war. Were those States afterward expelled from the Union by the war? The direct contrary was its purpose, and was so understood by all those who gave their blood and treasure to aid in its prosecution. It cannot be that a successful war waged for the preservation of the Union had the legal effect of dissolving it. The victory of the nation's arms was not the disgrace of her policy. The defeat of secession on the battlefield was not the triumph of its lawless principle. Nor could Congress, with or without the consent of the Executive, do anything which would have the effect, directly or indirectly, of separating the States from each other. To dissolve the Union is to repeal the Constitution which holds it together—and that is a power which does not belong to any department of this Government, or to all of them united. This is so plain that it has been acknowledged by all branches of the Federal Government. The Executive (my predecessor as well as myself), and the heads of all the departments have uniformly acted upon the principle that the Union is not only undissolved, but indissoluble. Congress submitted an amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by the Southern States, and accepted their acts of ratification as a necessary and lawful exercise of their highest function. If they were not States, or were States out of the Union, their consent to a change in the fundamental law of the Union would have been nugatory; and Congress, in asking it, committed a political absurdity.

THE STATE OF THE UNION.

It is, therefore, a source of regret that, in complying with obligations imposed upon the President by the Constitution to give information to Congress, from time to time, in relation to the state of the Union, I am unable to communicate any adjustment, satisfactory to American people, of questions which, since the close of the rebellion, have agitated the public mind. The contrary candor compels me to declare that at this time there is no such adjustment. The Union which we established can exist only if all the States are represented in the Houses of Congress, where each State is as free as another to state its internal concerns according to its own will, and where laws of the central government are confined to matters of national jurisdiction, apply with force to all the people of every State. That such is not the present state of the Union is a painful fact; and we all must acknowledge that the restoration of States to their proper legal relations with the Federal Government, and with one another, according to the terms of the original compact, would be the greatest blessing which God in his almighty Providence could bestow upon this nation.

It becomes our imperative duty to consider whether or not it is impossible to effect this most desirable result. The Union and the Constitution are inseparable. As the one is obeyed by all parties, the other will be preserved; and if the one is destroyed, both must perish. The destruction of the Constitution will be followed by the destruction of the Union, and still greater calamities. It is not only to form a perfect Union between the States, but "to establish justice, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Nothing but the strict obedience to its requirements in all parts of the country can accomplish these great ends. That obedience we can look only to continual outrages against individual rights, incessant violations of the public peace, national weakness, financial dishonor, total loss of our prosperity; the general opinion of morals and the final destruction of popular freedom. To our country from evils so apparent as these we should renew our efforts again and again.

THE PROCESS OF RESTORATION.

The process of restoration is perfectly plain and simple. It consists merely in a faithful application of the Constitution and laws. The execution of the laws is not obstructed or opposed by physical force. There is no military or naval necessity, real or pretended, which can prevent obedience to the laws. Either North or South, rights and all obligations of individuals can be protected and enforced by means perfectly consistent with the fundamental law. The courts may be wherever open, and if open, they would be unimpeded. Crimes committed in the United States can be prevented or punished by the proper authorities in a manner entirely practicable and legal. There is, therefore, no reason why the Constitution should not be obeyed, unless those who exercise its powers have determined that it shall be disregarded and violated. The mere naked will of this Government or of some one or more of its branches, is the only obstacle that can exist to perfect the union of all the States.

On this momentous question, and some of the measures growing out of it, I had the misfortune to differ from Congress, and have expressed my conviction without reserve, though with becoming deference to the opinion of the legislative department. Those convictions were not only unchanged, but strengthened, by subsequent events and further reflection. The transcendent importance of the subject was a sufficient excuse for calling your attention to some of the reasons which have so strongly influenced my own judgment. The hope that we may all finally concur in a mode of settlement consistent at once with our true interests and with our sworn duties to the Constitution, is too natural and too just to be easily relinquished.

AN OLD ARGUMENT.

It is clear to my apprehension that the States lately in rebellion are still members of the National Union. When did they cease to be so? Ordinances of secession, adopted by a portion [in most of them a very small portion] of their citizens, were mere nullities. If we admit now that they were valid and effectual for the purpose intended by their authors, we sweep from under our feet the whole ground upon which we justified the war. Were those States afterward expelled from the Union by the war? The direct contrary was its purpose, and was so understood by all those who gave their blood and treasure to aid in its prosecution. It cannot be that a successful war waged for the preservation of the Union had the legal effect of dissolving it. The victory of the nation's arms was not the disgrace of her policy. The defeat of secession on the battlefield was not the triumph of its lawless principle. Nor could Congress, with or without the consent of the Executive, do anything which would have the effect, directly or indirectly, of separating the States from each other. To dissolve the Union is to repeal the Constitution which holds it together—and that is a power which does not belong to any department of this Government, or to all of them united. This is so plain that it has been acknowledged by all branches of the Federal Government. The Executive (my predecessor as well as myself), and the heads of all the departments have uniformly acted upon the principle that the Union is not only undissolved, but indissoluble. Congress submitted an amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by the Southern States, and accepted their acts of ratification as a necessary and lawful exercise of their highest function. If they were not States, or were States out of the Union, their consent to a change in the fundamental law of the Union would have been nugatory; and Congress, in asking it, committed a political absurdity.

The Judiciary has also given the solemn sanction of its authority to the same view of the case. The Judges of the Supreme Court have included the Southern States in their circuits, and are constantly in bench and elsewhere, exercising jurisdiction which does not belong to them, unless those States are States of the Union.

If the Southern States are component parts of the Union, the Constitution is the supreme law for them, as it is for all the other States. They are bound to obey it, and so are we. The right of the Federal Government, which is clear and unquestionable, to enforce the Constitution upon them, implies the correlative obligation on our part to observe its limitations and execute its guarantees. Without the Constitution we are nothing. By, through and under the Constitution we are what it makes us. We may doubt the wisdom of the law; we may not approve of its provisions; but we cannot violate it merely because it seems to confine our powers within limits narrower than we could wish.

It is not a question of individual or class or sectional interest, much less of party predominance, but of duty—of high and sacred duty, which we are all sworn to perform. If we cannot support the Constitution with the cheerful alacrity of those who live and believe in it, we must give to it at least the fidelity of public servants who act under solemn obligations and commands which they dare not disregard.

The constitutional duty is not the only one which requires the States to be restored. There is another consideration which, though of minor importance, is yet of great weight. On the 22d of July, 1861, Congress declared, by an almost unanimous vote of both Houses, that the war should be conducted solely for the purpose of preserving the Union and maintaining the supremacy of the Federal Constitution and laws, without impairing the dignity, equality and rights of States or individuals; and that when this was done the war should cease. I do not say that this declaration is personally binding on those who joined in making it, any more than individual members of Congress are personally bound to pay a public debt created under a law for which they voted. But it was a solemn public official pledge of the national honor, and I cannot imagine upon what grounds the repudiation of it is to be justified. It is the fact that we are not bound to keep faith with rebels, let it be remembered that this promise was not made to rebels only. Thousands of true men in the South were drawn to our standard by it, and hundreds of thousands in the North gave their lives in the belief that it would be carried out. It was made on the day after the first great battle of the war had been fought and lost. All patriotic and intelligent men then saw the necessity of giving such an assurance, and believed that without it the war would end in disaster to our cause. Having given that assurance in the extremity of our peril, a violation of it now, in the day of our power, would be a rude rending of that good faith which holds the moral world together. Our country would cease to have any claim upon the confidence of men. It would make the war not only a failure but a fraud.

Being sincerely convinced that these views are correct, I would be unfaithful to my duty if I did not recommend the repeal of the acts of Congress, which place ten of the Southern States under the domination of military masters. If calm reflection shall satisfy a majority of your honorable bodies that the acts referred to are not only a violation of the national faith, but in direct conflict with the Constitution, I dare not permit myself to doubt that you will immediately strike them from the statute books.

To demonstrate the unconstitutional character of those acts, I need do no more than refer to their general provisions. It must be seen at once that they are not authorized. To dictate what alterations shall be made in the constitutions of the several States; to control elections of State legislators and State officers, members of Congress and electors of President and Vice President, by arbitrarily declaring who shall vote and who shall be excluded from that privilege; to dissolve State Legislatures or prevent them from assembling; to dismiss judges and other civil functionaries of the State, and appoint others, without regard to State laws; to organize and operate all the political machinery of the States; to regulate the whole administration of their domestic and local affairs according to the mere will of strange and irresponsible agents sent among them for that purpose—these are powers not granted to the Federal Government, or to any one of its branches. Not being granted, we violate our trust by assuming them as palpably as we would by acting in the face of a positive interdiction; for the Constitution forbids us to do whatever it does not affirmatively authorize, either by express words or by clear implication. If the authority we desire to use does not come to us through the Constitution, we can exercise it only by usurpation, and usurpation is the most dangerous of political crimes. By that crime the enemies of free government in all ages have worked out their designs against public liberty and private rights. It leads directly and immediately to the establishment of absolute rule, for undelimited power is always unlimited and unrestrained.

The acts of Congress in question are not only objectionable for their assumption of ungranted power, but many of their provisions are in conflict with the direct prohibitions of the Constitution. The Constitution commands that a republican form of government shall be guaranteed to all the States; that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law, arrested without a judicial warrant, or punished without a fair trial before an impartial jury; that the privilege of habeas corpus shall not be denied in time of peace, and that no bill of attainder shall be passed, even against a single individual. Yet the system of measures established by these acts of Congress does totally subvert and destroy the form as well as the substance of republican government in the ten States to which they apply. It binds them hand and foot in absolute slavery, and subjects them to a strange and hostile power more unlimited and more likely to be abused than any other now known among civilized men. It tramples down all those rights which the essence of liberty consists in, and which a free government is always most careful to protect. It denies the habeas corpus and the trial by jury. Personal freedom, property and life, if assailed by the passions, the prejudice or the rapacity of the ruler, have no security whatever. It has the effect of a bill of attainder or a bill of pains and penalties; not upon a few individuals, but upon whose masses, including millions who inhabit the subject States, and even their unborn children. These wrongs being expressly forbidden, cannot be constitutionally inflicted upon any portion of our people, no matter how they may have come within our jurisdiction; and no matter whether they live in States, Territories or Districts.

I have no desire to save from the proper and just consequences of their great crimes those who engaged in rebellion against the Government; but as a mode of punishment, the measures under consideration are the most unreasonable that could be invented. Many of those people are perfectly innocent. Many kept their fidelity to the Union untainted to the last; many were incapable of any legal offence. A large portion even of persons able to bear arms were forced into rebellion against their will, and of those who are guilty with their own consent, the degrees of guilt are as various as the shades of their character and temper. But these acts of Congress confound them all together in one common doom. Indiscriminate vengeance upon classes, sects and parties, or upon whole communities, for offences committed by a portion of them against the governments to which they owed obedience, was common in the barbarous ages of the world, but Christianity and civilization have made such progress that recourse to a punishment so cruel and unjust would meet with the condemnation of all unprejudiced and right-minded men. The punitive justice of this age, and especially of this country, does not consist in stripping whole States of their liberties, and reducing all their people, without distinction, to the condition of slavery. It deals separately with each individual, confines itself to the forms of law, and vindicates its own purity by an impartial examination of every case before a competent judicial tribunal. If this does not satisfy all our desires with regard to Southern rebels, let us console ourselves by reflecting that a free Constitution, triumphant in war, and unbroken in peace, is worth far more to us and our children than the gratification of any present feeling.

I am aware it is assumed that this system of government for the Southern States is not to be perpetual. It is true this military government is to be only provisional, but it is through this temporary evil that a greater evil is to be made perpetual. If the guarantees of the Constitution can be broken provisionally to serve a temporary purpose, and in a part only of the country, we can destroy them everywhere, and for all time. Arbitrary measures often change, but they generally change for the worse. It is the curse of despotism that it has no halting place. The intermitted exercise of its power brings no sense of security to its subjects, for they can never know what more they will be called to endure, when its red right hand is armed to plague them again, nor is it possible to conjecture how or where power next restrained by law may seek its next victims. The States that are still free may be enslaved at any moment, for if the Constitution does not protect all, it protects none.

THE NEGRO QUESTION.

It is manifestly and avowedly the object of these laws to confer upon negroes the privilege of voting; and to disfranchise such number of white citizens as will give the former a clear majority at all elections in the Southern States. This, to the minds of some persons, is so important that a violation of the Constitution is justified as a means of bringing it about. The moral is always false which excuses a wrong because it proposes to accomplish a desirable end. We are not permitted to do evil that good may come; but in this case the end itself is evil as well as the means. The subjugation of the States to negro domination would be worse than the military despotism under which they are now suffering. It was believed beforehand that the people would endure any amount of military oppression, for any length of time, rather than degrade themselves by subjection to the negro race; therefore they may have been left without a choice. Negro suffrage was established by act of Congress, and the military officers were empowered to superintend the process of clothing the negro race with the political privileges torn from white men.

The blacks in the South are entitled to be well and humanely governed, and to have the protection of just laws for all their rights of person and property. If it were practicable at this time to give them a government, exclusively their own, under which they might manage their own affairs in their own way, it would become a grave question whether we ought to do so, or whether common humanity would not require us to save them from themselves. But under the circumstances this is only a speculative point. It is not proposed merely that they shall govern themselves, but that they shall rule the white race, make and administer State laws, elect Presidents and members of Congress, and shape, to a greater or less extent, the future destiny of the whole country. Would such a trust and power be safe in such hands? The peculiar qualities which should characterize any people who are fit to decide upon the management of public affairs for a great State have seldom been combined. It is the glory of white men to know that they have had these qualities in sufficient measure to build upon this continent a great political fabric, and to preserve its stability for more than ninety years, while in every other part of the world all similar experiments have failed.

But if anything can be proved by known facts—if all reasoning upon evidence is not abandoned—it must be acknowledged that, in the progress of nations, negroes have shown less capacity for government than any other race of people. No independent government of any form has ever been successful in their hands. On the contrary, wherever they have been left to their own devices they have shown a constant tendency to relapse into barbarism. In the Southern States, however, Congress has undertaken to confer upon them the privilege of the ballot. Just released from slavery, it may be doubted whether, as a class, they know more than their ancestors how to organize and regulate civil society. Indeed, it is admitted that the blacks of the South are not only regardless of the rights of property, but so utterly ignorant of public affairs that their voting can consist in nothing more than carrying a ballot to the place where they are directed to deposit it.

I need not remind you that the exercise of the elective franchise is the highest attribute of an American citizen, and that when guided by virtue, intelligence, patriotism and a proper appreciation of our free institutions, it constitutes the true basis of a democratic form of government, in which the sovereign power is lodged in the body of the people. A trust artificially created, not for its own sake, but solely as a means of promoting the general welfare, its influence for good must necessarily depend upon the elevated character and true allegiance of the elector. It ought, therefore, to be reposed in none except those who are fitted, morally and mentally, to administer it well; for if conferred upon persons who do not justly estimate its value, and who are indifferent as to its results, it will only serve as a means of placing power in the hands of the unprincipled and ambitious, and must eventually result in the complete destruction of that liberty of which it should be the most powerful conservator.

I have, therefore, heretofore urged upon your attention the great danger to be apprehended from an unmitigated extension of the elective franchise to any new class in our country, especially when the large majority of that class, in wielding the power thus placed in their hands, cannot be expected correctly to comprehend the duties and responsibilities which pertain to suffrage.

Yesterday, as it were, four millions of persons were held in a condition of slavery that had existed for generations. To-day they are free, and are assumed by law to be citizens. It cannot be presumed, from their previous condition of servitude, that as a class they are as well informed as to the nature of our government as the intelligent foreigner who makes our land the home of his choice. In the case of the latter, neither a residence of five years and the knowledge of our institutions which it gives, nor attachment to the principles of the Constitution, are the only conditions upon which he can be admitted to citizenship. He must prove, in addition, a good moral character, and thus give reasonable ground for the belief that he will be faithful to the obligations which he assumes as a citizen of the Republic.

Where a people, the source of all political power, speak by their suffrage, through the instrumentality of the ballot box, it must be carefully guarded against the control of those who are corrupt in principle and enemies of free institutions; for it can only become to our political and social systems a safe conductor of healthy popular sentiment when kept free from demoralizing influences, controlled through frauds and usurpation by the designing, anarchy and despotism must inevitably follow. In the hands of the patriotic and worthy our Government will be preserved upon the principles of the Constitution inherited from our fathers. It follows, therefore, that in admitting to the ballot box a new class of voters, not qualified for the exercise of the elective franchise, we weaken our system of government instead of adding to its strength and durability. I yield to no one in attachment to that rule of general suffrage which distinguishes our policy as a nation; but there is a limit wisely observed hitherto, which makes the ballot a privilege and a trust, and which requires of some classes a time suitable for probation and preparation. To give it indiscriminately to a new class, wholly unprepared by previous habits and opportunities to perform the trust which it demands, is to degrade it and finally to destroy its power; for it may be safely assumed that no political truth is better established than that such indiscriminate and all-embracing extension of popular suffrage must end at last in its overthrow and destruction.

I repeat the expression of my willingness to join in any plan within the scope of our constitutional authority which promises to better the condition of the negroes in the South, by encouraging them in industry, enlightening their minds, improving their morals, and giving protection to all their rights as freedmen. But the transfer of our political inheritance to them would, in my opinion, be an abandonment of a duty which we owe alike to the memory of our fathers and the rights of our children.

The plan of putting the Southern States wholly, and the General Government partially, into the hands of the negroes is proposed at a time peculiarly unpropitious. The foundations of society have been broken up by civil war. Industry must be reorganized, justice re-established, public credit maintained, and order brought out of confusion. To accomplish these ends would require all the wisdom and virtue of the great men who framed our institutions originally. I confidently believe that their descendants will be equal to the arduous task before them. But it is worse than madness to expect that negroes will perform it for us. Certainly we ought not to ask their assistance until we despair of our own competency.

The great difference between the two races in physical, mental and moral characteristics will prevent an amalgamation or fusion of them together in one homogeneous mass. If the inferior obtains the ascendancy over the other, it will govern with reference only to its own interest; for it will recognize no common interest, and create such a tyranny as this continent has never yet witnessed.

Already the negroes are influenced by promises of confiscation and plunder. They are taught to regard as an enemy every white man who has any respects for the rights of his own race. If this continues, it must become worse and worse until all order will be subverted, all industry cease, and the fertile fields of the South grow up into a wilderness. Of all the dangers which our nation has yet encountered, none are equal to those which must result from the success of the effort now making to Africanize the half of our country.

I would not put considerations of money in competition with justice and right, but the expenses incident to reconstruction under the system adopted by Congress, aggravate what I regard as the intrinsic wrong of the measure itself. It has cost uncounted millions already, and if persisted in will add largely to the weight of taxation already too oppressive to be borne without just complaint; and may finally reduce the treasury of the nation to a condition of bankruptcy. We must not delude ourselves. It will require a strong standing army, and probably more than $200,000,000 per annum to maintain the supremacy of negro governments after they are established. The sum thus thrown away would, if properly used, form a sinking fund large enough to pay the whole national debt in less than fifteen years.

It is vain to hope that negroes will maintain their ascendancy themselves. Without military power they are wholly incapable of holding in subjection the white people of the South.

GENERAL NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.

Chicago has been selected by the Radicals as the place in which to hold their Convention to nominate a candidate for the office of President of the United States, at the ensuing election. Prominent Radicals declare that this insures the nomination of Grant.

An analysis of the vote in the House of Representatives on impeachment shows that among those who voted in the negative were sixty-nine Republicans. If the question had been the laying on the table, the yeas would have been about 102, as several would have voted for that who were unwilling to vote "no." As the question was put, the announcement of the voting and the warning of the Speaker against any demonstration created no excitement.

MOBILE, Dec. 11.—A grand Conservative meeting was held here to-night in response to a call of many citizens. The object of the meeting was protection against the action of the late State convention and to organize Conservative political clubs throughout the city and State.

The meeting was largely attended and was very enthusiastic. Perfect order was maintained throughout.

Patriotic speeches were made by Hon. Robert S. Smith, Hon. Percy Walker and Major Henry St. Paul, of the Times.

MONTPELIER, Vt., Dec. 12.—A train with seventy workmen backed off an abutment of a recently burned bridge yesterday.

Fifteen men were instantly killed, and four have since died. Many others were more or less injured.

SANDUSKY, Dec. 12.—The severest snow storm ever known here has been prevailing for the last twenty-four hours. The water in the bay rose five feet.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 12.—All trains behind hand. No trains leaving.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 12.—A furious northeast snow storm commenced early this morning.

PARIS, Dec. 11.—The Monitor says: Conference negotiations continued, and there is renewed confidence.

FLORENCE, Dec. 11.—It is thought that the Italian chambers will reject the vote declaring Rome the capital of Italy.

LONDON, Dec. 12.—Soldiers who marched in the Fagan funeral procession have been arrested, and are to be court-martialed.

The Southern University Series of Text Books.

1. SOUTHERN ELEMENTARY SPELLING BOOK.—By Geo. F. Holmes, LL.D., of the University of Virginia.—New York, Richardson & Co., 14 Bond street; D. H. Maury, New Orleans; M. Morfit, Baltimore, 1867.

This Spelling Book presents, in addition to the usual classifications of words according to their vocal sounds, accent, and consonant sounds: tables of words which differ by nice shades of sound. It is free from wood cuts, which all spelling books should be—a very distracting element to a child learning to associate certain sounds with certain dull looking letters. Another excellent feature in this book is, it introduces the child to a great many silvery ringing words of our language, and thus early impresses the ear with the best of English.

The style of getting up is fair. The selections are, if anything, too Southern. Our writers have heretofore had a small place in the publications of Northern book-makers. The principal part of the intellectual wealth of the country has been confined, according to those gentlemen, to Boston and its surroundings. Speeches by the Otises, the Quineys, and the Hapeooks, supplied a large part of the patriotic and literary pabulum by which the ideas of young America were to sprout and spout. Bunker Hill, and that memorable 'sink or swim' speech of the elder Adams, which by the by he never delivered, were paraded as the highest themes and performance possible to man. We are glad to see that this Virginia Series lets us into the secret that even in '76 a few things were said and done outside of New-England utterances and achievements.

Readers and Primers are a quiet but very potent method of writing and shaping history. It takes a lifetime to contradict a spelling

The recent War of the States traced full as directly to the prophesies as to the Reviews of the country. The picture of the field, the slaves with a white around the middle, and the able overseer with a broad hat, and a long whip lash, and a large part of the business of the nation by a school-book. It is a great thing for us to have a series of books well written by men who have no pristine to the South.

Charles S. Venables, Professor of Mathematics in the University of Virginia, &c.; same publishers. These arithmetics are the best we have ever examined. The are simple, and philosophically introduced, and explained with simplicity of terms which nothing to be desired—so it is to us. We regard this as the best of this whole series of showing more originality greater mastery of the subject of its various processes. Each set forth and lodged in a mind before the rule's good. This movement from the abstract to the concrete is, we think, the true order to be observed.

Elementary Grammar of the Language, by Geo. J. Holmes, &c.; same publishers. The logical arrangement, the part of this work leaves nothing desired, in so far. The examples are new. The definitions are clear and lucid—especially in the department of Latin Grammar, by Basil L. Leeve, Professor of Greek in the University of Virginia, (same publishers.) This work is a complete grammar—the German Grammar.

who know what place a good heart of his family, and how consistent Christian life is, can estimate the loss of this excellent young man. was for many years intimate with the deceased, as school and friend, and he cannot say thing in the living that the memory of the dead. the life war which wrecked the integrity of much older than himself, "Rob" resolutely "kept the faith" and rather "grew into the knowledge and love of God." In those times of trial, he was the mainstay of his family. The frequent and protracted absence of his father, threw upon him the burden of providing for those at home, and though but a boy in years, he met every necessity of the difficult charge with the prudence and firmness of a full grown man.

Very early in life he evinced those excellencies of disposition that distinguished his youth, and was fast developing into a most perfect manhood. The influence of pure religion, early embraced, guided him in everything, pointed every word and not with purpose, and impressed all who observed him with the fact that he was living in earnest. Often, in the intimacy of almost hourly intercourse, the writer has watched him for some exhibition of filial piety, especially when he was tried by those little vexations which more than great ones, perhaps, bring out the real character; but his was no holy-day religion, and he was rarely if ever foud with-out his armor.

"Rob" was always kind; ever willing to forego his own pleasure when duty required it, and most happy when contributing most to the happiness of others. He was a faithful student, full of promise, beloved by his fellows, and winning from all his teachers the highest commendation. In a word, there met in him all the characteristics of an obedient son, affectionate brother, kind friend, and consistent Christian.

It is hardly necessary to say, that the death of such a one was in keeping with his life. With noble disregard of self, he left his own sick bed to assist in nursing others—relapsed and died. Constant delirium prevented any expression of a fitness for the great change; but those who had seen him live, could not doubt that he was ready to die.

It is hard to part with one so kind, so noble, so worthy to live. But we who loved him cannot "sorrow as those that are without hope." The same Lord who blessed in giving, has no doubt, blessed still more in "taking away."

The death of the precious boy though it occurred so early, was not premature. He had accomplished the object for which his life was given, else surely, the Master would not have called him. He felt that he had a work to do; he was always doing it; he died doing it and it is done. What more? "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; for they rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

Died at the residence of her father, Rev. William Littlejohn, in Harrison county, Texas, on Sunday night, Nov. 10th, 1867, Mrs. MARY E. COLEMAN, wife of Mr. W. S. COLEMAN.

Among the many dear friends who have passed away during the last three months is this sweet spirit. If there were no other evidence of the existence of Paradise, the departure of the noblest of earth would be sufficient to suggest the great truth. Youth in all its loveliness, and age in all the glory of its maturest powers, are equally claimed by the Saviour, as part of His inheritance in the Saints. They go at his call to swell his praise, to reflect his image and to share his triumph. Those we love, He loves, and as we love Him he calls upon us to resign them in his favor. To watch the first budblings of childhood, the development of the graces of Christian character with the loveliest of natural charms, and then just as the mature life begins, to be called to give up that dear child, is a lesson of love hard to learn even from the Father of mercies. Still He giveth more grace.

We transcribe the following from a letter received from the bereaved husband of our dear friend.

"MOLLIE died sweetly and peacefully in the full realization of the triumphs of that religion of which she was so bright an exponent. She died without a struggle, without a gasp, without a sigh to give sign that the spirit, so fit for Heaven, had even one lingering regret at leaving its sweet yet feeble body. She endured over five months such excruciating pains as but few mortals know, and fewer still know how to bear. Throughout her long and agonizing pains, there was a mysterious sustaining aid given her that enabled her to smile sweetly and speak quickly of her trials, and to cheer the sad, loved ones who ministered around her dying couch—made holy by her gentleness and her purity. It was not alone a hope of recovery, it was not alone fortitude, it was not alone strength, for she was a feeble flower; but it was a vital and energized faith in her Heavenly Father that enabled her to work out some great good, and that in the end, each pang suffered here would turn to a thrill of joy hereafter; and that each dark hour would be followed by ages of brightness in the spirit land."

MARY J. E. ROSS, eldest daughter of Maj. E. K. M., and Ann L. Ross, departed this life in Morehouse Parish, La., Oct. 16, 1867, in the twenty-first year of her age. She professed religion at Homer, La., in her thirteenth year, under the ministry of brother P. L. Henderson, and every afterwards maintained a pious, christian course of living, thus following the example of pious parents, always punctual when circumstances would admit of it, in her attendance at church, at Sabbath-School, and all the means of grace, faithful in the discharge of her religious duties. She enjoyed the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and when death came, she had fully prepared herself to meet it. A week or ten days before she was attacked with her last sickness, she recovered from a spell of fever, and after she was able to sit up, she remarked to her parents: "If I had died during my sickness, I felt fully prepared." A few days after this, she was taken suddenly and violently ill. I believe the physicians have not yet decided upon the nature of this later disease. It entirely prostrated her, and she was delirious for three days. Finally reason was restored, yet her sufferings were great,—she bore them all with fortitude and christian resignation. The physician attending her, thought it to be necessary to blister her, he did so, arrested the disease; but the blistering proved fatal, mortification took place, and she died.

Some two or three nights previous to her death, she sung, in a clear distinct voice, the hymn, so appropriate under the circumstances,

Loving Jesus, gentle lamb, In thy gracious hand I am; &c.

When she had ceased singing, her father said to her, "there daughter, I would not sing any more just now, you are so weak." Just a few minutes before she died, those about her bed discovered that she was engaged in prayer. Her father remarked to her: "Daughter do you love the Lord?" She opened her eyes full upon him, and with a smile peculiarly expressive of the joy she felt in her heart, replied: "I do." These were the last words she spoke on earth, a few minutes elapsed and her happy spirit gently and quietly left its clay tabernacle, and ascended to the bosom of the God she loved, and who she had so faithfully served for the last eight years.

May the good Lord bless the afflicted and bereaved parents, brothers and sisters of the deceased, and renitite them again in heaven.—Amen! J. L. Wainwright.

Bastrop, La., Nov. 19, 1867.

Died, at Gainesville Junction, Mobile and Ohio Rail Road, Mrs. CORNELIA HUBBARD, wife of Rev. Eli Hubbard, of Macon, Miss.

The deceased was born in Madison Co., New York, 1831. Made profession of faith in Christ, 1857, at Potsdam, New York, uniting with the M. E. Church, at that place, and for eight years past a resident of the South.

Such is the brief record the hand of affectionate remembrance desires to make of one whose unexpected death, has thrown a deep, dark shadow upon the heart, and name of friend, and acquaintance in this community. Though singularly quiet in her demeanor, and character, yet, she but seldom, if ever, failed to impress all with whom she had intercourse, that she possessed in an eminent degree, those admirable traits which mark the true woman and which prepared her to fill with peculiar fidelity the sacred spheres of wife, and mother.

Her only sorrowing child was the subject of her most careful, constant, and affectionate training, while he by whose side she walked, for a few brief years, this life's winding way, feels indeed that the path formerly brightened by the mild, yet beautiful radiance of her presence, is now sadly and mysteriously darkened, and that the weight of an affliction inexpressible has fallen upon him. But let us "cast our burthens upon Him, who careth for us."

"Who could bear life's stormy doom,
"Did not thy wing of love,
"Come gently waiting through the gloom,
"Our peace branch above."

May the great God, "whose ways are indeed past finding out," enable the stricken ones, yet surviving, to be cheered with the blissful experience, that,

"Sorrow touched by that grows bright "With more than rapture ray,
"As darkness shows us worlds of light
"We never saw by day."

Represent the preferred claim upon one of the most important lines of communication in the world, as it is the sole link between the Pacific Coast and the Great Interior Basin, over which the immense over land travel must pass, and the MAIN TRUNK LINE ACROSS THE CONTINENT. The Road is now nearly completed from Sacramento to the Richest Mining Regions in the Salt Lake Basin, and is being rapidly carried forward by the largest force of laborers ever employed by any Railroad Company on this continent.

The natural, legitimate, commercial business of the road surpasses all previous expectations, and is profitable beyond parallel, even among the oldest roads in existence. The earnings and expenses for the Quarter ending Oct 31, were as follows, in GOLD:

| $598,847.92 | $102,088.61 | $496,759.31 |

This result, however, would have been far greater but for the inability of a wagon team to forward the freight and passengers from the temporary terminals in the mountains.

The United States Government and the State and Cities of California have so aided and fostered the Great Enterprise, that the Company will assume very light annual interest obligations, and will have the following ample Resources at command for the Construction:

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

From the Children's Hour.
FATHER IS COMING.

BY MARY HOWITT.
The clock is on the stroke of six,
The father's work is done; Sweep up the hearth and mend the fire, And put the kettle on.
The wild night-wind is blowing cold,
The dreary crowsing o'er the world.

He's crossing o'er the world space, He's stronger than the storm;
He does not feel the cold, not he,
His heart is so warm.
His father's heart is stout and true As ever human bosom knew.

He makes all toil, all hardship light;
Would all men were the same!
So ready to be pleased, so kind,
So very slow to blame!
Folk need not be unkind, auster;
For love hath reader will than fear.

Nay, do not close the shutters, child;
For faralong the lane
The little window looks, and he Can see it shining plain.
I've heard him say he loves to mark The cheerful flight through the dark.

And we'll do all that father likes;
His wishes are so few;
Would they were more, that every bone Some wish of his I knew!
I'm sure it makes a happy day When I can please him any way.

I know he's coming by this sign,
That baby's almost wild, See how he laughs, and crows, and starns—Heaven bless the merry child!
He's father's self in face and limb,
And father's heart is strong in him.

Hark! hark! I hear his footsteps now, He's through the garden-gate.
Hush, little Ben, open the door,
And do not let him wait.
Shout, baby, shout! and clap thy hands,
For father on the threshold stands.

A KING'S GIFT.

Some pleasant stories have been told of the sympathy felt by Queen Victoria for the poor among her subjects, and of her charitable gifts. The following story from an English paper will show that George III. sometimes performed similar actions:

One day His Majesty was walking in the neighborhood of Windsor, when he chanced to see a little boy of ten years old taking care of some sheep.

"What have you there, my boy?"

"The ABC book, sir," replied the boy, boldly.

"Can you read, then?" inquired the king.

"A little, sir."

"Can you spell words of two syllables?"

"Yes, sir; I think so."

"Well, spell 'abbot'."

"A-b, b-o, abbot."

"Well done! that will do. Can you read as well as you can spell?"

"Do you go to school? and do you read the Bible?"

"Mother is too poor to send me to school, and she has only part of a Bible, and that is so torn and dirty that it is of no use."

"O, that is bad, very bad. What is her name, and where does she live?" asked the king.

The boy told the king and he wrote it down in his pocket-book.

As soon as he arrived at the castle he sent for his secretary and said to him:

"My poor people around here have not sufficient means for instruction, and more must be provided for them. Send this packet immediately to the one to whom it is addressed; and at the same time let it be made known to the poor woman it is intended, that this book is given to her on one condition; that is, that she shall continue to have her child taught to read; and let money be provided for to send him to school."

The good king put a £5 note into the Bible, and wrote on the title-page of the book: "From George III. for Mrs. ——" "Let it be sent forthwith; for it is our will that every one in our kingdom shall have the opportunity of reading the Bible."

The poor woman, since the death of the king, has been offered large sums for the Bible, but she has refused them, saying that she would never part with it during her lifetime, and that, when it was God's will to lay her on her dying bed, she wished it to be put under her pillow.

Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest; prayer is the issue of a quiet mind, of untrodden thoughts; it is the daughter of charity, and the sister of meekness; and he that prays to God with an angry, that is with a troubled and discomposed spirit, is like him that retires into a battle to meditate, and sets up his closet in the out quarters of an army. Anger is a perfect alienation of the mind from prayer, and therefore is contrary to that attention which presents our prayers in a right tone to God.

The Wonderful Textile Fabrics of Hindoostan.

In the manufacture of muslin the Hindoos surpass all other people, as they do in the manufacture of the Cashmere shawl. There is a class of muslin termed "woven air," the fabric of which is so marvellously fine that the Hindoos themselves are fond of relating all kinds of strange theories respecting it.

Mr. Bolt, in his "Consideration of the Affairs of India," speaking of the Dacca muslin, says that according to report, the Emperor Aurangzebe once "was angry with his daughter for showing her skin through her clothes, whereupon the young princess remonstrated in her justification, that she had seven jupitils, or suits, on; another tale was to the effect that, "in the Nabob Allaverry Kahwan's time, a weaver was chastised and turned out of the city of Dacca for his neglect in not preventing his cow from eating up a piece of 'Abrovan,' which he had spread and left upon the grass—the muslin, of course, being so fine that the animal could not see it upon the herbage.

So delicate is the manufacture of the short staple of the Dacca cotton, that it can only be woven into yarn at certain times of the day. The morning is generally so employed before the dew has left the grass; if spinning is carried on after that time, the spinner, who is always a woman under thirty years of age, spins the yarn over a pan of water, the evaporation of which affords sufficient moisture to prevent the fibers from becoming too brittle to handle. Delicate as the muslin is, it will wash, which European muslins will not. The durability of the Dacca muslin, notwithstanding its surprising fineness—a piece of "evening dew" one yard wide and four yards long, only weighing 556 grains—is said to be owing to the greater number of twists given to the Dacca yarn, as compared with the finest muslin yarns of England or France. The time taken to spin and weave the threads in a piece of "woven air" is very great; the reader will not therefore be surprised to hear that it sells at the rate of a guinea a yard.

The "Abrovan," or "Running Water," is considered the second class of muslin; "Sabaum," or "Evening Dew," is the third quality. It is so called because it is so fine that it is scarcely distinguished from dew upon the grass. There are several other very fine Dacca muslins that are known by distinctive names, but these so poetically designated are the most famous. The Dagbhoobees, who remove iron mold from this precious material, use the juice of the amroold plant for that purpose; and to remove other spots or stains a composition of ghee, lime, and mineral alkali. There are Mohammedans who also repair this "woven air" with a skill equal to that of the Hindoo, who weaves it. For instance, it is said that an expert Rafuger, or darning, can extract a thread twenty yards long from a piece of the finest muslin of the same dimensions, and replace it with one of the finest quality. It is said that they execute their finest work under the influence of opium.

A still more exquisite and expensive work of the Indian loom is the figured muslin. A piece of this fabric measuring twenty yards, made in 1776, cost as much as £56. The splendid yet subdued effect of weaving gold and silver thread into the different fabrics made in India has never been even approached by Europeans. Some of their silks have a sheen upon them like the breast of a pigeon, or indeed of the Imperial pheasant. In nature we never find that even the most splendid effects offend the eye by appearing harsh. The Indian artist seems to have caught the very art there is in nature, and he uses his gold and silver with a caution, a prodigality, and economy fitted for the occasion. The native never throws away gold where it will not be seen. Thus on the turban cloth only the end that hangs down by the neck is thus ornamented; in the waistcloth the fringed end, etc. The gold thread is so very pure that it never tarnishes, and it washes just as well as the other threads of the garment. The thread of the precious metals is called kullabooton, and is manufactured wholly by hand.

The embroidery in the woven garments in which this absolutely pure gold is employed never tarnishes—a perfection to which European fabricators have not yet attained.

[We have seen a veil brought by Gov. Thomas H. Seymour—who was for six years our Minister to St. Petersburg—from Tartary, which, although one yard wide and three long, would float in the atmosphere for an appreciable time before descending to the floor.—Enquirer]

NEW PROCESS FOR COATING IRON AND STEEL WITH COPPER.—Letters printed in our columns a few months ago, lead us to think that an easy method of giving iron and steel a firm coating of copper is a desideratum. We find a process published by Dr. Grager, which is certainly the simplest we have met with, if it be really successful. The plate or article of iron or steel, which it is desired to coat, must first of all be perfectly cleaned. It must then be brushed over with a solution of protochloride of tin, in dilute hydrochloric acid. The author makes his solution by dissolving one part of the chloride of tin in two parts of water, to which he adds two parts of commercial hydrochloric acid. Directly after this solution is applied, another of ammoniacal sulphate of copper is brushed over. The latter is made by dissolving one part of sulphate of copper in sixteen parts of water, and adding gradually sufficient strong ammonia to form a clear dark-blue solution. The coating of copper deposited in this way is said to be so firmly adherent that it may be polished with chalk without any fear of its being detached. A coating of copper can be obtained on zinc by merely using the ammoniacal solution of copper, and with out the preliminary use of the chloride of tin solution. The coating of copper given by this process must be excessively thin, and would only be available for decorative purposes. But if it answers, it is clear that an iron ship can be coppered as easily as she can be painted.—Mechanics Magazine.

A PROCESS FOR DECOLORIZING PETROLEUM OIL.—That very industrious technical chemist, Dr. R. Wagner, tells us that the disagreeable odor of petroleum oil can be taken away by treating the oil with a solution of plumbate of soda. This is only a solution of oxyd of lead in caustic soda, and will certainly remove all such odor as sulphur compounds might communicate to the oil. How far it may affect other smells we cannot tell without experiment.—Mechanics Magazine.

LIQUIDS FOR SOLDERING METALS.—The following are approved formulas:—(1) One part of chloride of zinc, two parts of chloride of ammonium, dissolved in sufficient water. (2) Metallic zinc (spelter) dissolved in muriatic acid at saturation; a teaspoonful of sal-ammoniac be added to each four fluid ounces.—Druggists Circular.

Killing Time for Hogs and Beef.

The subject of killing domestic animals for food comes directly home to every farmer and farmer's wife in the country. Slaughtering is not so pleasant to the farmer as the preliminary labors of breeding, raising, and fattening, neither are the labors it imposes upon the good wife so agreeable as preparing the fat spare-ribs and sirloin roasting pieces for the table, yet both are equally necessary.

It is very desirable to have cold weather for the operation, and as our cold days are very likely to come in threes or fours, there seldom being more than four consecutive very cold days, and usually but three, it is best to be ready, and take the first clear cold day for the work, and trust to the two following to freeze what meat is to be kept fresh. In regard to pork, that is almost all to be salted or smoked, this is not very important, yet it is much more convenient and pleasant to handle meat that is firm and cold than that which is flabby.

The most convenient way for a farmer to handle heavy hogs in slaughtering is to have a block and tackle to swing the hog by while bleeding, the rope being made fast to one hind leg below the hook. By the same tackle he is lifted and lowered into the tub of hot water in scalding for the removal of the bristles. The dressing table should be level with the tub, and as soon as one hog is scalded and lifted out upon the table, the rope may be attached to another. It will not be necessary to use the tackle to lift the hogs out of the tub, for this may be done easily if two ropes held apart by three or four rungs, like a piece of rope-ladder, are fastened to the table, and lie in and across the tub, so that the hog will lie upon them; taking hold of the ends of the ropes two men can lift and roll out a heavy hog easily.

In cutting up beef, it is important to remember that the object is not simply to get it all into small pieces, but to have the pieces of such shape, and so cut with relation to the bones, that the meat will cook to the best advantage, cut up well, appear well on the table, and more than all, be most palatable and nutritious. All this depends much upon the cutting up of the carcass. They are many approved ways of doing this, and we cannot now discuss them, but may give two general hints, which, if followed, will be satisfactory to everybody. First, cut so that the pieces, when brought to the table, may be cut across the fibre, as squarely as possible. Second, so divide the carcass that each part shall have its due proportion of bone. This is difficult indeed, for the shins and knuckles will have much bone and little meat, the end of the ribs too, and the piece including the great bones of the hip and pelvis will be disproportionately bony, and pieces cut from the leg for smoked beef and salting may properly be quite free from bone; nevertheless, retail butchers know they must ever try to make a fair division of the bone among their customers, and the result is much more satisfactorily shaped pieces than if this principle were not heeded.

FISH OIL AND GUANO.—On the United States coast from Newbern, N. C., to Mt. Pleasant Bay, Me., there are about 100 manufactories of fish oil, producing 30,000 barrels of oil, worth $500,000, and 20,000 tons of guano, worth nearly as much more.

WRITING MACHINE.—A Mr. Pratt, of Alabama, has exhibited a writing machine before the Society of Arts in London.

At St. Charles, Mo., there is a manufactory of ultra-marine, which is afforded at a much less price than the imported article.

England uses 850,000,000 postage stamps annually; France, 450,000,000; and the United States, 350,000,000.

Beaumont, France, manufactures annually about 800,000 gold and silver watches.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The General Assembly occupied a large share of public attention last week in Nashville. The pulpit of most of the Churches were filled by ministers of the Assembly. It was our good fortune to hear Dr. Stuart Robinson at McKendree. We do not remember hearing so good a sermon from any preacher not "of our faith and order." Indeed, his manner, spirit, teaching, all corroborated the intimation which we have received of his Methodist antecedents. He ignored all theological technicalities, and handled his hearers for an hour and a half on the delay of conversion with such a power of argument and force of appeal as seemed to be wholly irresistible. Why does not every preacher, "knowing the terror of the Lord," thus "persuade men"? The Doctor headed the Commissioners of the Synod of Kentucky, who were formally received into the Assembly—an event which gives us great satisfaction. The venerable Dr. Plumer was inaugurated as Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C.—the charge being delivered by Dr. Lyon. The Messengers of the Associate Reformed and Cumberland Presbyterian Churches, the Rev. Drs. Pressly and Baird, were kindly received, but the negotiations in reference to organic union with the Assembly came to naught, as we had supposed would be the result, because of the question of psalmody in the former case, and irreconcilable differences on doctrine and education for the ministry, in the latter.

The Synods of Missouri was represented by the Rev. A. P. Foreman, who said that though, from prudential reasons, it declined at present organic union with the Assembly, it was in perfect sympathy with it.

Rev. Dr. B. M. Smith, from the Committee on Bills and Overtures, reported Overture No. 4, which was as follows:

The Synod of Georgia, in session at Atlanta, October 26, 1867, respectfully memorialize the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States to the propriety of sending a delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, tendering to them our Christian salutations, and, if agreeable to them, proposing to establish a correspondence between the Churches.

A true extract from the Minutes of the Synod of Georgia.

JOHN S. WILSON, Stated Clerk of Synod of Ga.

Answer.—That in view of the fact that the Methodist General Conference meets so less frequently than our Assembly, such correspondence could not conveniently be conducted, with any special advantages greater than what are already possessed by occasional ministerial intercourse and the intercommunication of our people.

All the important business of the Assembly was transacted, we believe, in a pleasant and satisfactory manner, and the Commissioners leave Nashville with the kind regards of the citizens, who will rejoice to welcome them at any future session which they may appoint to be held in this city. They closed their labors Nov. 29. The next session is to be held in Baltimore, May, 1868.

The greatest and serious objection to Stove Ovens has been entirely overcome in the

GOOD SAMARITAN,
by the adoption of a New Principle of heating and Ventilating the Oven, as by means of the Draft formed by the Ventilation of the Oven, the temperature of the fire is so much increased that a large supply of fuel is never consumed, as the Oven can be thoroughly heated, and all the different operations of Cooking performed with a saving of fuel.

At Least Thirty per Cent, as Compared with any other Stove.

And at the same time rendering it the most perfect and even Baking Stove now in use. For heating the Kitchen or Roaster, generally known as the "Duck Oven," it is most admirably adapted to The Good Samaritan, as its height above the hearth is such that a large and capacious oven can be used. That means roasted in an oven are always preferable in every way to those baked in the Stove Oven, we believe no one will deny, and we therefore do not deem it necessary to dwell upon these advantages, which are peculiar to this Stove.

It also has a most complete arrangement for drawing on the front hearth, thus enabling the cook to successfully carry on the work of cooking with the other work, and thus avoiding the serious objection made to those Stoves which require no other convenience for Baking than the top. One trial of this apparatus for Baking will be sufficient to commend it to the attention of the operator, as it works well, and the food retains all its flavor and tenderness. Relying, as we do, The Good Samaritan to all, and even more than it is here described, we confidently recommend it to all. A full and impartial trial to all that is necessary to any one desiring to satisfy them that it is in all respects the

THE HOME MONTHLY, New Orleans.

The HOME MONTHLY will contain forty eight pages of reading matter, printed upon fine paper and in clear type, and will, from time to time, be accompanied by elegant steel-plate engravings. The subscription price will remain $3 per annum, or $1 50 for six months, invariably in advance. In order to build up a still larger circulation, we have concluded to offer the following

Liberal Inducements to Agents:
To any person sending us three yearly subscriptions, with nine dollars, we will send the MONTHLY six months or allow them, if they prefer, to retain One Dollar and Twenty-five Cents of the amount.

To any person sending us six subscriptions, with eighteen dollars, ($18), we will send the MONTHLY one year, or allow them to retain Two Dollars and Fifty Cents of the amount.

On amounts for subscription less than nine dollars, agents will be allowed to retain ten per cent.

Ministers, it is hoped, will find it as agents, not so much from pecuniary considerations as from a laudable desire to assist in building up a home literature worthy of a place among the families of the South and on the center-tables of a Christian people.

Offers to Families

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

We have but little change to note in the general market. There is, however, more doing in the wholesale trade, nearly every branch of which participates in the improvement. Our leading staple has continued in active demand, and prices have advanced $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ per lb, but receded towards the close to their previous position. Sugar, has been in good request and commanded full prices. Molasses has been dull at a further decline in consequence of the supply exceeding the demand. Nothing of any moment has been done in Tobacco; and the movement in Western Produce has been of moderate extent, with but few variations in price.

COTTON.—We noticed in our last report that the market closed on Friday evening at 13 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢ to 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ for Ordinary, 14 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢ to 14 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ for Good Ordinary, — to 15 for Low Middling, 15 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ to — for Middling, 15 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ to — for Strict Middling, and 16 to 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ for Good Middling, since which, under the favorable influence of the foreign news, noticed above, prices advanced $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ to $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢, but lost the improvement yesterday. On Saturday, at the opening of business, the movement was checked by the stringent pretensions of factors, but the enquiry was fair and a moderate amount changed hands at stiffer rates, when the Liverpool telegrams gave an additional impulse to the demand, and the sales summed up 3750 bales. On Monday, buyers again came forward with a fair degree of spirit, and notwithstanding operations were restricted by the limited extent of the supply offering, yet the business comprised 3,600 bales at prices exhibiting a continued tendency in favor of sellers, but without any quotable advance. Tuesday under the combined influence of a decline in gold causing a corresponding heaviness in foreign exchange, and discounting accounts from New York, the market lost its buoyancy, and with increased anxiety on the part of factors to realize, and buyers standing aloof anticipating a still greater decline, prices gave way $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ to $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢, and the sales were confined to 2400 bales.

The receipts proper since Friday evening, embrace 13260 bales, against 11445 during the corresponding period last week showing an increase of 1815 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 146,157 bales, against 240,873 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 22,579 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 14,263 bales to Great Britain, of 3511 to France, and an increase of 35,711 to other foreign ports.

We now modify our quotations as follows:

|-----------------|--------|----|--------|
| Low | 13 1/4 | to | 13 1/2 |
| Ordinary | 13 1/2 | to | 14 |
| Good Ordinary | 14 | to | 14 1/2 |
| Low Middling | 14 1/2 | to | 15 |
| Middling | 15 | to | 15 1/2 |
| Strict Middling | 15 1/2 | to | 16 |

SUGAR.—The demand has continued good, and the receipts have sold quite readily at full prices.

MOLASSES.—The sales have been for the past three days, 2700 barrels, at prices within our quotations.

FLOUR.—There has been a better feeling since our last review, especially for Superfine and Double Extra, which are scarce and most in request, principally for shipment, and have brought better prices, while the other grades remain unchanged.

CORN.—The market has ruled quietly but firmly, with a light stock and not much demand.

PORK.—Has continued in request with the dealers and prices have further advanced 50¢ to $1 per bbl since our last review.

BACON.—The market is well supplied, but there is not much demand at wholesale. A brisk retail business is doing at previous prices.

RICE.—The stock of Louisiana Rice offering is large but the demand is limited, and sales are mainly restricted to few small lots at retail.

THE BEST ARE THE CHEAPEST.
THE MASON & HAMILIN CABINET ORGANS have just been awarded a FIRST PRIZE Medal at the Grand Exposition in Paris, in competition with instruments from the best makers of all countries. This makes over seven ty highest premiums awarded them within a few years. Testimonials from more than three hundred of the most prominent musicians in the country that these instruments are "unequaled are published in the circulars of Mason & Hamlin.

Observe that dealers in musical instruments are strongly tempted to recommend as equal to the best, those instruments on which they can make the largest profit. The prices of M. & H. are fixed and unchangeable. They cannot afford the large discounts made by manufacturers of inferior work, many of whom sell at 40 to 50 per cent discount.

At the prices at which they are sold, the Mason & Hamlin Organs are believed to be not only the best but the cheapest instruments of their class. Send for circular, with particulars, to MASON & HAMILIN, William Mason & E. S. Hoady's New Method for the Pianoforte.

Already a second edition of this new work is ready and nearly sold in advance. It is new method and matter, embracing modern exercises and expedients not heretofore presented, while its selection of Exercises, Recitations, and Pieces, mostly from composers of recognized eminence, is unusually large and very choice.

This is the first instruction book to include the technicals of modern pianoforte playing. It has a full elucidation and illustration of Mr. Mason's new system of Accidental Treatment of Exercises, by which the attention of the pupil is rendered nearly impossible, while not only the hands, but also the mind, taste, and artistic perceptions are cultivated and trained.

It is eminently a practical work, the result of long and most successful experience in the actual business of pianoforte teaching. It is carefully progressive, very clear and perspicuous and full in its explanations and directions, illustrated by cuts and diagrams, and is adapted to the use of young beginners as well as of those who have made progress. 249 pp., large 4to. Price $4. Two editions are published; one with American and one with European Fingering. Care should be taken to designate which is wanted. Published by

WANTS OF THE CHURCH.

Many things have been said and written respecting the wants of the Church. Some things have been done to help it: Departure from rules of long standing and acknowledged efficiency, and the formation of new ones, have been resorted to in order to assist the Church. Now what impression will all such work likely make on the sober and reflecting mind? Surely that of a decayed and rotten building; old pieces of timber to be taken out and new ones put in—a disagreeable and sometimes unprofitable business.

The Church, it is true, has age upon its side—is as old, at least, as the first promise—"The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." But I love the Church on account of its venerable age. The storms of six thousand winters and the burning heats of six thousand summers have fallen upon it, yet it lives.—Nations and empires have arisen and passed away; millions of men have lived, grown old, and died; but here is the Church still. The highest order of talent has been arrayed against it, nations have warred and rivers of blood have been shed to destroy it, but it yet lives.

A Church which has outlived so much opposition, and breasted so many storms, must have some inherent life-power within it which is indestructible; must have some Divinity in it. Can this building, then, with all this vital energy about it, be in a state of decay? I answer, no! There is really no rotten piece of timber in it. It needs no propping, no mending.—Whenever we commence this operation, instead of mending the Church, we begin constructing one of our own making.

What then does the Church need? As it is composed of individual members, lay and clerical, what it needs most is the charging of these members with the electric fires of the Holy Spirit. Now whether the changes being wrought into Methodism will be beneficial or not, time only will reveal. It is an experiment. But one thing I do know—neither one nor all these changes together, will ever bring these heavenly influences into the heart of a single minister or layman. I sometimes fear that it is the absence of the Spirit in the souls of our people, which creates so great a disposition to mend and prop the Church. Not having a full baptism of the Spirit in our hearts, we try to supply the defect by stopping up the old road and blazing out new ones.

The Saviour said to the disciples, "Tarry at Jerusalem till ye be endued with power from on high; for ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." Returning to Jerusalem they continued in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in supplications and prayer till this Divine influence was given. Mark you, they never attempted to convert a single soul, nor even, so far as we know, preach a single sermon, till they received this power. The command was, "Tarry at Jerusalem till ye receive power." But when the power, the spiritual baptism came, for which they were waiting, the engine of salvation moved, the whole train started, and three thousand souls stepped on board the first day. Beginning at Jerusalem, under a full head of Divine power, they now went over islands and continents preaching the gospel, the Lord confirming the word with signs following. Here was the great secret of Apostolic success in preaching the gospel and establishing Christianity. God, in the person of the Holy Spirit, was in the Apostles and first Christians. This enabled them to forego the pleasures of home, kindred, and friends; renounce the world with all its pomp and show, and encounter the scorn, derision, and persecutions of men, in order to carry the tidings of salvation to lost sinners. They had no ponderous, unwieldy church organizations to trouble them, but some of long standing, antagonistic to the genius of Christianity, to contend against. They had to meet the religious prejudices and superstitions of accumulated ages, both of Jews and Gentiles. But under the guidance and influence of this Divine power within, nobly and sublimely did they plant the church of God upon so firm a basis that the "gates of hell" have never yet prevailed against it.

I contend that this Divine power within both laymen and Ministers is exactly what the Church needs now, more than all our efforts to repair and mend. But is it our privilege to have this power? O, blessed Bible! to thee we appeal. In the memorable sermon preached by Peter, on the day of Pentecost, he used these emphatic words: "The promise (that is, of the Spirit) is unto you and unto your children, and to all that are afar off, even to as many as the Lord our God shall call." This includes all mankind. Thank God, then, the same baptism of the Holy Spirit is, by promise of Him who is faithful and true, ours now. God hath spoken it and it must be so. But if we would enjoy this blessed state, we must continue in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in supplications and prayers. O that the whole Church were full of faith and the Holy Ghost!

MOBILE CONFERENCE.

MARION, ALA., DEC. 12, 1867.

MR. EDITOR: At the instance of Dr. J. Hamilton I send you a few items from our Conference. The fourth Session of this body convened in the basement of the Baptist Church in this city on yesterday at 9 a. m. Bishop Wightman presiding. Bishop Andrew is present also. Both look to be in excellent health, full of faith and the Holy Ghost, and assure us that there is no cause to be discouraged in our great work. A large number of the members of the Conference are present, and a fair proportion of the Lay Representatives elected by District Meetings to this body. These form a body of fine looking men, able to devise wise and liberal things for the Church. Brought face to face with the great interests of the Church, and having practical contact with its wants all over and all around the broad land, they will now appreciate the wants of other localities than their own, and having to devise, they certainly will sustain the great general interests of the Church. The Laity is well represented on Committees, as well as in the general minute business of the Church. Now that Lay Representation is a fact accomplished, an experiment fully entered upon, we are sure that the problem of their usefulness to the Church is finding for itself a happy solution in actual experience. By prompt and full attendance on the Conference sessions, and by earnest and intelligent labor during Conference, the Lay Representatives are disappointing all the evil forebodings and unfavorable prophecies respecting their value to the Church.

ORGANIZATION

was completed by the election of Jas. A. Heard, Secretary, and J. M. Brown and P. G. Wood, (the latter Lay Representative) Assistants. Also, by the appointment of the usual Standing Committees. Stirring addresses, reaching, rousing, and inspiring the hearts of the preachers, were given by Bishops Andrew and Wightman. We felt glad that we were called to the joy of suffering for Christ's sake.

COMMUNICATIONS

were read and disposed of by reference to proper committees.—The principal of these were from our Advocate offices and from the Publishing House. They are the great intellectual centres of Methodism—and among them all this Conference, "forsaking all others, will cleave only unto thee so long as we both do live."

Your piquant and pithy letter to Dr. Hamilton was read in the hearing of the Conference, and at its close, the claims of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE were warmly urged by Dr. H.—We feel that there is no rivalry between the Advocates. Dr. Summers, with the Advocate at Nashville, rolls round the great wheel (iron, if you will, and turned by steam at that). He stands on the tall watchtower, commanding a view of all the Conferences.—Yours of the patronizing Conferences. The Nashville should be in the hands of every preacher in the Southern Church. The New Orleans in the hands of every preacher and every family of the patronizing Conferences.

Thursday, 12th Dec., 9 a. m., business resumed after the usual opening services.

The first question—"Who are admitted on trial?" was taken up and the following admitted—viz: Rufus W. Coons, David M. Rush, Benj. F. Reed, Jas. Bush, Geo. M. Gilmore, and Thos. Caneron.

STATISTICAL REPORTS

caused some trouble. The new order of things is not fully understood by all. It was argued that those of us who were prepared should report upon assessments and receipts—others excused.—Next year we will have, and the Conference will take, no excuse.

The second question—"Who remain on trial?" was taken up.—Thos. A. S. Adams, R. M. Powers, R. J. Perry, and J. N. Walker passed and continued on trial.

The faith and spirit of the preachers are greatly encouraged by the reports. From the Montgomery Conference we learn that over eleven hundred have been added to the Church during the present year, and ours, I am satisfied, will be in that neighborhood. We are willing to live hard and work harder for Christ's sake and for the salvation of souls. Thank God, Southern Methodism has been able, under God, to keep abreast with the foremost in its legitimate work, and from that we are resolved that no force, however strong, shall drive us. Let us stay in the path assigned us by the great Head of the Church, and we shall find our way brighten under the approving smiles of God. More anon.

THOS. S. ABERNATHY, JR.

Mississippi Conference.

The Mississippi Conference now in session in this city, is no ordinary body. It represents an ecclesiastical society of great numbers, respectability and influence, and marked by a zeal and devotion that is self-communicating, active and earnest.

The bounds of the Conference are of wide extent, reaching from near the eastern line of the State to the Mississippi river—embracing all the Florida parishes of Louisiana except New Orleans and Baton Rouge, and extending northward to a line drawn somewhere through the upper part of Carroll and the lower part of Noxubee counties.

The present is the fifty-second session of the body. Though many of the older ministers belonging to it are not present, yet the assembled body is one of dignity, and commands high respect from the intelligence and standing of its members.

Over this body presides the venerable ROBERT PAINE, a native of South Carolina, and for fifty-four years an active member of the Methodist ministry. He is among the oldest of American Divines, and bears a reputation for great learning and piety, and of ardent zeal in his Master's cause. He entered the ministry at the early age of sixteen years, and has devoted to it his subsequent life. In the full enjoyment of health, and with a vigorous constitution, it is to be hoped that many years of active usefulness are yet in store for him. He was for a long time President of LaGrange College, and at the organization of the Methodist Church, South, was chosen one of its Bishops, and was ordained in 1846. He stands next to the venerable Bishop Andrew as the Senior Bishop of the Church South. In social life, as President of the Conference, and in the Stationing-Room, where the ministerial field of operations is annually planned, soundness of judgment and benignity of heart are prominent traits of his character. A man of extensive culture, and of persistent labor, he deserves the high distinction he enjoys.

The names occurring on the roll in the order of seniority, are those of Rev. John G. Jones and Dr. W. H. Watkins—both natives of Jefferson county, Miss. Mr. Jones entered the ministry in 1824. His integrity and worth entitle him to a veneration his Juniors seem readily to concede. He has written several works; one of which has been recently published, and is a most readable and instructive book, entitled "The Introduction of Protestantism into Mississippi and the Southwest." Very many of its scenes and incidents refer to Natchez and its vicinity, and will be found of peculiar local interest to our citizens. The family of this excellent minister settled in this country at a very early date; coming here from New Jersey in 1773, and making their residence near the present Kingston.

The family of Dr. Watkins settled in Jefferson county also at a very early date, 1801. The Doctor is alike well known, and highly beloved and respected. Born in 1815, he entered the ministry in 1835, and has been a laborious and successful minister for nearly a third of a century. He is now President of Centenary College, Louisiana, though still claiming his residence in Mississippi, where he has lived all his life.

Among the clergy present whose talents are devoted to the cause of education, we notice the Rev. W. T. J. Sullivan, President of the Woodville Female Seminary, and the Rev. H. F. Johnson, President of the Whitworth Female College, at Brookhaven—both institutions of high merit and usefulness.

The Rev. Patrick Lane is a very noticeable man, apparently about forty-two years of age, and blind from infancy. Talented in the extreme, highly educated, a profound thinker, and one of the most eloquent men of the day, his deprivation of external vision has but opened the mind's and heart's eyes to the hidden things so nearly connected with man's eternal welfare. We understand that he will preach on Sunday, and predict that he will be listened to by a full and delighted congregation.

The Rev. Charles G. Andrews is Secretary of the Conference. He is sprung from an Adams county family, though having his own residence and field of labor in Madison. He is a gentleman of high character and marked appearance and address. He is assisted in his duties by the Rev. Messrs J. A. B. Jones and L. R. Redding.

The Conference was opened on Wednesday morning last with religious services, conducted by Bishop Paine, followed by a feeling and appropriate address. On Thursday the opening exercises were by the Rev. Benjamin Jones, of Wesson.

The death of two members of the Conference was appropriately announced—that of the Rev. R. W. Lambuth, of the Clinton, and Rev. H. D. Berry, of the Homesville Circuits.

The Rev. Mr. Taylor, Superintendent of the spiritual interests of the colored people in the Memphis Conference, and the Rev. Mr. McLaughery, of the Louisiana, were introduced to the Conference.

The sessions of Wednesday and Thursday were principally occupied in the reading of reports from the various educational institutions connected with the Conference, and in the usual examination of the character of ministers.

Committees are now in progress upon the subject of Sunday Schools, Missions and Education, and are expected to report to-day. The Missionary interests of the Conference, we regret to hear, are drooping; but it is believed that the Church itself is more prosperous than last year.

There will be several ordinations on Sunday—that of Deacons after the 11 o'clock services, and of Elders after the 3 o'clock services. We give, elsewhere, the various appointments for preaching to-morrow.

FRIDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

Religious exercises by Rev. R. J. Harp, of Louisiana; who, with the Rev. Dr. Stratton, of the Presbyterian Church in this city, were introduced to the Conference.

Reports from the N. O. Christian Advocate, Sunday School Visitor, Home Monthly, N. O. Book Depository, and Centenary College, were read and referred. All these interests were shown to be in a flourishing condition.

A report from the Committee on "the religious interests of the colored people," was read and laid on the table for the examination of the members.

A communication from the Mississippi Conference of the Methodist Church, looking to a union with the Methodist Church, South, was read and referred; as also a communication in regard to an English Grammar, published by the late John T. Spence.

The remainder of the session was occupied with the usual examinations of ministerial character.

From the Western Christian Advocate.

The Austrian Concordat.

In 1855 the young Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, assisted by Bach and Rauscher, concluded a Concordat with Rome, of which the following are the leading points. (At that time it was said that the Virgin Mary had appeared to the afflicted Emperor in a vision and ordered him to conclude the Concordat.) "To the Catholic Church are guaranteed all rights and privileges that belong to her by the will of God and the laws of the Church; ecclesiastical laws are valid without the approbation of the prince; the bishops can communicate with Rome without let or hindrance, as well as the priests with the people in spiritual affairs; the bishops can publish pastorals without the placet of the Government; the bishops have the right to forbid books and journals whose contents are obnoxious to the Church, and to censure their authors publicly; the religious education of the young in all kinds of schools in the empire is subject to their control, and the teachers of religious seminaries are appointed by them; no one is allowed to lecture on theology or ecclesiastical law without the permission of the bishops; ecclesiastical affairs are judged by ecclesiastical judges exclusively; a divorce to a mixed couple—Catholic and Protestant—can be granted by a Catholic tribunal alone; the bishops inflict ecclesiastical punishments on those who violate the laws of the Church; they may found, by acting in concert with the civil government, new convents for monks and nuns; the monks may communicate freely with their superiors at Rome; these superiors can visit all the cloisters and convents of the empire as often and whenever they please; the right of the Church to acquire property is unlimited, and the property of the Church is inviolable."

To an American, who takes it as a self-evident truth that Church and State must be separated, a number of these items seem perfectly proper and legitimate; he claims for every Church a perfect autonomy. But here is a difference. In Austria the Catholic religion is the religion of the Empire; other confessions are, virtually, only tolerated, and the Catholic hierarchy claims all these rights and privileges for herself exclusively, denying them firmly to all heretics and errorists. The Protestants of the country, who constitute about one-sixth of the population, are, by the regulations of this Concordat, exposed to many kinds of persecution. But it is not they, it is the Catholic population, the representatives of the peoples of the many countries of Austria, that overwhelm the Reichsrath with petitions to abolish this infamous compact that weighs like an incubus upon the people and paralyzes their efforts. Let us take, but one point—the education of the young. It is true, the letter of the compact speaks only of the religious education; but, if it is borne in mind that the teachers are trained by the Church exclusively, that they are all their lifetime subject to the priesthood, it is self-apparent that the Church has the whole training of the young in her hands. She says how many hours daily must be given to catechetical instruction, what subjects must be taught, what not be taught. No wonder that a petition from Transylvania to the Reichsrath, lately, set forth that their children knew every thing about heaven, but nothing of its resources and productions, etc. But it is especially the higher classes that are insulted by such laws—history, jurisprudence, the sciences, everything is subject to the interference of an arrogant and fanatical priesthood. No wonder that they turn away with disgust from religion and become infidels. That the Emperor of Austria is thus in an unenviable position is self-apparent. On the one hand the bishops and clergy, with their bigoted followers, in a close phalanx; on the other, the thinking portion of the population, and the daily increasing deterioration of the condition of the Empire, the public treasury empty, and untold millions in the hands of the Church, are imperium in imperio, yea, the Empire itself.

UNCERTAINTY.
O! Father, hear!
The way is dark, and I would fain discern That steps to take, into which path to turn; O! make it clear.

My faith is weak;
I long to hear Thee say, "This is the way; Thou hast a faithful soul, I'll be thy stay;" Speak, Lord, O speak!

Let Thy strong arm Break through the gloom for me to loan upon,
And with a willing heart I'll journey on,
And fear no harm.

I wait for Thee
Who, watching, wait the coming dawn;
Thou hast promised never to forsake Thy child, as for water pants the thirsty fawn; O! come to me.

It is Thy child
Who sits in gloom uncertainty and doubt, Waiting and longing till the light shine out Upon the wild.

My Father I see,
From the faithfulness displayed of old,
And the love that never can grow cold—I trust in Thee.

And Thou wilt guide;
Thou hast promised never to forsake
Thy child, as for water pants the thirsty fawn; I've none beside.

Thou knowest me;
Thou knowest how I now in darkness grope; O! Thou knowest that my only hope Is found in Thee.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

NO. II.

SHANGHAI, Oct. 9, 1867.

As to Missionary matters, the merchants at Shanghai being judging, we are, though slowly, accomplishing more than they are. We are not, however, without great embarrassments.

The revival in the Shan Tung provinces continued for a long while, and over a hundred members were received into the Wesleyan Methodist Mission, but recently a violent persecution from the Mandarins overtook them and the work is in abeyance, the converts are scattered and their estates have been plundered and confiscated. We are encouraged, however, to learn that they return to the old paths of sin and idolatry, are content to be in the for Christ's sake.

On account of these things, our native brother, (not native helper he has sometimes been called in the papers), could not get his cond to return to us and take work in Nankin, as we desired of him.

At present, therefore, we have at one native preacher engaged, and he is rather feeble and unable to do much.

I have another young man engaged teaching a day school, and sometimes have him exhort after teaching. This is the extent of our native help at present. Bro.
—'s day school has been discontinued, but he proposes to re-open again as soon as possible.

We continue to hold our respective offices as Interpreter and Teacher, but we have no guarantee that we can continue in them after the new year. We are much perplexed to know what to do.— Should we lose our present situation we have no means of support, and there is not a cent in the treasury; besides, we are in debt on last year's account for money borrowed by advice of the Board, hoping that early remittances would enable us to return it. But another year is fast closing, the debt is long past due, and we are without a dependence for the next year. These things confuse and complex us, yet we struggle on in the hope that even our darkest hour may be the precursor of the day of much sigh for.

Our work is progressing as favourably as we could expect—nothing very encouraging, yet nothing discouraging during the past year.
Of the eight probationers reported in my last letter I have hopes respect to baptize five of them very shortly, perhaps at our next communion. In all up to the present time we have baptized thirty-two.

Up to the date of Bro. Cunnyng's leaving us, there were only twenty-two baptized and enrolled on the Church book. How the number ever came to be mentioned at home as thirty-five or six years ago, I cannot imagine. We do not count probationers, except as such. Placing the number at thirty-long before it actually reached that number, has doubtless produced an unfavorable impression in regard to our work, and it would appear that we have not been as diligent and faithful as our predecessors. We have not done much it is true, but what it is should be credited to the proper account.— We hope by the close of this year to have increased our actual membership to upwards of forty, and to have yet a number of inquirers awaiting admission.

But, my brother, before we can make full proof of our ministry the church must sustain us,—we cannot sustain ourselves and the work too. Bro. C. is with you now, and he has had long and large experience in matters pertaining to the history and work of the China mission, and what he said in the General Conference about its support ought to be considered.

I spent the first two years of my time here in acquiring a modicum of the language, and just as I was getting able to make myself heard our embarrassments set in and have never let up. When I think of what we've passed through, I sincerely thank God that I am neither an invalid nor a non com-pens mentis.

I am at present in the attitude of a soldier armed and equipped, with the language at least, and ready for orders to march. But, oh! when will those orders come?
My soul thirsteth for the strife, and I am anxious to make way for the Prince of peace, and see the foundations of his kingdom laid.
Not that I may run away from Shanghai to find a place to labor, but that I may be made free to labor here, is what I crave of the Church and Board. Notwithstanding I have been here upwards of seven years, I have never felt that my hands were entirely free, that I had no other concern or work to do here but preach Christ and him crucified. I long for that freedom. I am striving to do all I do with a view to the advancement of the cause of Christ, but necessity is upon me, has been and still is, to provide for my household as well; and Paul tells us this last is of great concern, so great that he who neglected to do it "hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

Pardon these reflections. I deeply sympathize with our dear Church and people. I know they suffered much every way, that they are impoverished and sorrow-stricken. My friends, and property too, were a prey to the times; the war robbed me of many of the former and swept much of the latter away. But thanks be to God, the treasures I have laid up in Heaven were not subject to these changes of fortune. Henceforth let us lay up more diligently of our substance and its increase there. Lend it to the Lord, and when this tabernacle shall have dissolved, the Lord will introduce us to a mansion prepared above, and richly return all we have loaned to him on earth.

Yours in Christ,
YOUNG J. ALLEN.

A PECULIAR AIR PUMP formed of two barometer tubes was lately to be seen in London. In it the ascending and descending mercury is made to perform the office of pistons, and by means of double valves at the top to exhaust the air from the bell-jar. The vacuum which resulted was declared nearly perfect, or greatly superior to the effect from the employment of the ordinary air pump.

If the young would remember that they may be old, and the old would remember that they have been young, the world would be happier.

SCIENCE IN SCHOOLS.

From the London Quarterly Review.

The general qualities which promise success in any walk of life, and which may be grafted on any young mind, or at least largely developed in most, are precisely those which are not only the essential requisites of success in scientific research, but are also peculiarly nurtured and strengthened by scientific work. Very striking is the analogy between the difficulties a man meets with in actual life and those which beset a physicist in his attempts to solve a physical problem, and between the intellectual resources necessary in either case to overcome obstacles. What the novelists call the problem of life cannot, with any great amount of truth, be compared to a mathematical theorem, deduced by a long train of reasoning from fundamental axioms and definitions; still less can it be likened to the construing of a Greek verse, or the composition of Latin verse; but it may be fairly spoken of as a long series of experiments, through which the investigator grope his way with broken light and faltering steps, now losing the thread, now catching it up again, and arriving at a happy issue only by dint of perseverance, of watchful attentiveness of mind, of conscientiousness, exactitude, and cautious judgment. The man who begins an original investigation in experimental science before his mind has been brought into thorough subjection by suitable training, finds himself continually led astray by many potent temptations, and brought back again as often by the bitter teachings of failure. One of his early sins is a want of watchfulness, a habit of stupid staring, of looking without seeing, of pretending to notice and yet not observing.— Nature beckons and waves her hand for him to follow, but he is sleepy, and regards her not; and she sweeps by him out of sight. Or he is lazily careless, and wilfully inaccurate; thinks that brown will do as well as black, and that six and three are nearly ten. Soon after he finds writ large, in scrawling letters over all his labored work, that brown is brown, and six and three make nine. But those are gross faults, of which a man must get rid with all haste if he is to hope ever to achieve any worthy result. And yet, having put these aside having become thoroughly watchful, and painfully careful, he finds many snares still lying hid for him. Perhaps his longest struggle is with the tendency which ever prompts him to see that which he wishes to see. It appears to him, for instance, extremely probable that a certain series of experiments would end in the establishment of such and such a result, which, if established, would throw considerable light on this or that obscure subject. With this hope he begins his work. In such cases as these, nature is very pliable; she bends entirely to the wish of the inquirer.
Everything comes out exactly as he desired. Fact is linked on to fact, until the research is complete, and the whole is arranged in perfect order. After a while, if the student be sober and patient enough to wait, little clouds of suspicion arise, and the experiments are repeated.
This time, however, the results are different. Suspicions swell into absolute distrust, and the whole matter has to be gone into again. The fear of having blundered quickens the eye to see things unseen before, the linked facts break up in confusion, and the whole research has to be confessed a failure. Or perhaps the excited author will not wait, and, carrying his work hot from the laboratory to the press, sees, soon after, with shame, his whole structure laid low by a few sturdy strokes from a truer hand. In a still worse plight is the man who, settled by a refutation of his views, repeats his experiments with a still stronger desire to find them true, and, of course finding them true, adds one more to the wretched controversies of his time. Sooner or later, however, all work of this kind meets with its Nemesis; having no root in truth, it withers up, and is swept away. Yet, in spite of the warning of previous examples, danger of this kind is ever present to every one who follows scientific pursuits, and the temptation can be overcome by no means save by a steadfast watchfulness, carried on until the forced attitude of mind becomes a natural habit, until the practised observer is no more likely to be led away from truth by a desire of fulfilling his own wishes than by a love of opposing those of others, until the question over his head becomes, not What he ought it to be? but What can I make it to be? but simply and plainly What is it? Such a man is thus made to feel, as he can be made to feel by no other means, that there is something sacred in oven the jobs and titles of natural laws; he learns to put away from himself all personal pride, and steps across the threshold of nature with bare head and bare feet; and the love of truth becomes with him a passion. He is taught, as he can be taught by no other means, that truth not only is, but can easily be reached by a mind active and upright; he passes beyond the common honesty of the world; and reaches forward towards that perfect sincerity, which is the fruit of long-continued watchful-ness, self-denial, humility, patience, and care.

The want of perfect sincerity in an inquirer is apt to show itself by a tendency to disregard little adverse circumstances because they are little, and to slur over everything which does not quite accord with the general tenor of his results as "matters of no practical moment" or "near enough to the truth." The evil of giving way to this form of carelessness many a scientific man has learnt by a costly experience. The tale is a very old one. A man begins a line of investigation, and, while all things seem to prosper, there turn up here and there little odd bits of fact which contradict, or at least do not confirm, the results he has already arrived at. He passes them by as more curious irregularities. By and by, as the inquiry is pushed on, and he gets more and more anxious for the final result, these odd bits keep turning up again and again. They become manifestly larger and larger every time they appear, and swell at last into such importance that they throw into confusion the whole of the research.
Or perhaps, instead of warning him from time to time during the process of the inquiry, they hide themselves for long periods, and appear suddenly; it may be at the very end of his labor, confound him with their rapidly-developed greatness.
In either case the inquirer must count his labor as lost; he must retrace his steps, search backward for the neglected bits, and, haply having found them, must gird himself to go through his work all over again. These little things are the touchstones of the thoroughly sincere mind, and watchful attention to them is the key to success.
The man who slurs them over will never arrive at truth, will either labor in vain, or, still more often, breed confusion. The men whose minds refuse to slight such things, are the men of whose names the world afterwards becomes proud; for not once or twice, but almost every year, the little projecting points, which the hasty insincere man shuffled over as slight irregularities in his path, have been carefully dug round by a wiser and more truthful man, and shown to be the mere tips of hidden rocks fit to become the corner-stones of future buildings.

We might indeed gather together all the qualities necessary for success in scientific inquiry under the two heads of watchful attentiveness of the senses and what we have ventured to call scrupulous sincerity of mind. Without these no man can hope to pluck the fruit of discovery, and the measure in which any one possesses them will be the measure of his intellectual success.
They are qualities which do not belong to the mind by nature; they need to be planted, or at least tilled. They are moreover, not mere opinions, to which a man may be converted in a day. It is not enough for a man to appreciate watchful-ness and sincerity; he must learn by experience how to keep himself awake and how to purge himself from insincerity, both of which are hard and painful tasks, to be mastered only by daily care and daily trials. The scientific man must work and fail, and fail and work, until a watchful sincerity becomes to him as the very air he breathes.

The very same qualities, of course, go far to ensure success in life, and the very same lessons are taught by experience of the world.
It is the distinctive mark of science, however, and the chief token of its educational value, that its teachings are swift, decisive, and sure. The punishments of the world are proverbially uncertain, halting, and slow. A man sows the wind in his youth, but he does not reap the whirlwind till he is old. He casts his lies on the waters, but it is not till after many days that they come back to him. He may march from error to error without meeting a single rebuke; he may even live a life of mistakes, and die without discovering one. But no one can go wrong in the pursuits of scientific truth without his sins very speedily finding him out. He is careless and inattentive one day, and confusion creeps over him on the morrow. He hastens to publish an unfinished research, and sees it crumble to pieces before twelve months are over. Again and again he sees men building reputations on the discovery of matters which he had caught sight of and yet neglected years ago. Every day almost, in some form or other, he is rebuked for his shortcomings, and made to pay penance for careless faults. The punishment may be light, but it is quick, and seldom misses its mark. And it is just this frequent repetition of little chiding blows that makes the pursuit of science so valuable as an intellectual training. Characters cannot be beaten into shape by a few heavy blows; it is by slight taps and almost imperceptible touches, repeated day by day and week by week, that the impulsive, careless, willful is moulded into the sober, watchful, sincere, and successful man.

Dr. Breckinridge and the Convention.

The following is the statement of the Presbyter of Nov. 13th:—

The Rev. Dr. Eagleson (Old School), of Western Pennsylvania, moved that a committee be appointed to report a basis of union between all the branches of the Presbyterian family, for consideration and adoption by them. The motion was seconded, and, being announced, was lengthily discussed. Dr. Breckinridge took the floor very promptly, and proceeded to say:

"I am decidedly opposed, sir, to this motion, or any effort of the kind—that is, proposing any basis for organic union between these bodies. I suppose the Old School Presbyterian Church is the largest body of Presbyterians in the world, and there are sitting down here two or three offshoots from us, the New School and the Cumberland people; but I would be willing, and I suppose all of our churches and our people would be willing, to let the United, Reformed (or whatever you call it) Church prepare and give us a basis for union, provided only they will do it better than we could ourselves. Now, I shall ask that brother [referring to Dr. Eagleson] to withdraw his motion, though I know he won't do it, for he's a Presbyterian [laughter]; or I shall feel obliged to go on and make some further remarks.—Will the brother withdraw his motion?"

Dr. Eagleson replied, through the Chair, that the motion was already the property of the house, and he could not, therefore, take it again.

Dr. Breckinridge then proceeded —The chairman asked him to come to the platform—he had been speaking from the middle aisle, at the side of which he had been sitting—and he did so, climbing up with some difficulty, and talking the while. He began anew when he reached the platform, stating his opposition to the proposal of any plan for union. "The most likely union that can be looked for, sir," he continued, "is between our church and the other branch, as they have got now to calling it; but, sir, that union will never be consummated [sensation], for all they have appointed a committee, and so on. No, sir, you will not see that union if you live." Here Mr. Stuart, whom he was addressing, said: "I hope I shall, sir." "Well, sir," replied the Doctor, "I hope you'll live a thousand years; but, take my word for it, you'll never see that reunion. Not but that I respect and love my brethren that are on that committee—those of the Old School, I mean—I don't know anything about the others [laughter], but they won't accomplish this. Why, sir, there isn't appointed on all that committee of our Assembly, a single man who has any reputation, whatever, for theological learning."

Several members rose to call the speaker to order, and the chairman, rapping the desk with his gavel, reminded Dr. Breckinridge that personalities could not be allowed. The Doctor went on, however, in the same strain for a moment, when the chairman again called him to order.
The Doctor turned somewhat wrathfully to the chairman and continued speaking, while Mr. Stuart said: "I have as much respect for Robert J.
Breckinridge as any man has, but I cannot permit these remarks on brethren known and respected."

Dr. Breckinridge demanded to know what was the name of the brother who had called him to order.
He did not mean to offend the feelings of any one; "I am responsible," said he, "to God Almighty and not to man for what I say, and I know what I am saying; and if any one doesn't like what I say, he knows where I live."

Further objection being made to the spirit of the Doctor's remarks, the chairman again called him to order, whereupon Dr. Breckinridge began to descend from the platform, saying something about not being allowed to speak.—Many members cried out to him to "Go on," and the chairman most courteously bogged him to remain and finish his remarks, but the Doctor, stepping back again, said, "No, sir, I will not go on—and if you proceed to force this matter through, the curse of God will rest on you!"

The remark was received with cries of "Shame!" and not a few bisses from all parts of the house, quickly rebuked by the chair, who reminded the Doctor that he should remember that he was not in his own church courts only, but in general convention. "Well, sir," said Breckinridge, "I know where I am, —and this is the first time I ever saw a layman constituted the presiding officer of such a body. It is contrary to all law and precedents."

With that the Doctor left the stand, and returned to his seat. This little scene thoroughly waked up the convention, much as stunning into a tub of cold water; might wake a gentleman who had calculated on a cold bath, but not quite upon taking it at so early a period, and so unceremoniously. Undoubtedly the water would do him good, however ill the phantasy that pitched him out might have meant it; and his day's work would probably begin earlier and more energetically for the event. It was so with the Doctor's performance. Somebody very speedily asked, "Does Dr. Breckinridge express the views of the Old School delegates here?" To which so many voices responded that one might have thought it—as it could have truly been—a unanimous vote "No." Considerable discussion then followed, the principal address being made by the Rev. Dr. Musgrave, (O. S.); of this city, the question being upon the direct appointment of a special committee to prepare a basis for union, or the reference of the proposal to appoint this committee to some existing permanent committee. Dr. Musgrave spoke at considerable length, laboring to remove the odium which might attach to the Old School from the action of one of their representatives. He was earnestly desirous of Presbyterian reunion on a proper basis, though he was utterly opposed to the present proposed plan between the Old and New Schools. He thought the Presbyterian Church desired unification, and that this convention was ready, at once, to go to this matter. The committee would need time to prepare such a basis as we now desire, and he hoped they might be appointed and go to work at once.

THE BURNING STAR.—The following account of an event more awful and sublime than the most vivid imagination can fully conceive is given by Edwin Dunkin, of the Royal Observatory, England. It is only one of several similar cases on record. In May last a star blazed forth in the Northern Crown and was of the second magnitude. The astronomers gave it immediate scientific observation and recorded the results in technical terms which need not be repeated.

"There can be little doubt that, from some cause unknown to us, it must have been the subject of a terrible catastrophe at a period perhaps distant; for it must be borne in mind that, owing to its immense distance from us, we may be only witnessing the calamity of a past age. From the sudden blazing forth of this star, and then its rapid fading away, Mr. Hoggins and Dr.
Miller have suggested that, in consequence of a great internal convulsion, probably a large quantity of hydrogen and other gases were emitted from it.

During a discussion on this star, at a meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society, on June 8th, the astronomer royal expressed his firm belief that this wonderful object was actually in flames.

If we were inclined to speculate on this unique astronomical phenomenon, or the probable consequences arising from such a sudden outburst of fiery gas, what an extensive subject for contemplation is opened to us! Astronomically we have known this minute star for years without suspicion; it has been classified with others of similar magnitude; it has been one of many millions of such; while now it will be remembered by all future generations as one of the most extraordinary among the most celebrated stars of the universe. Or, let our speculation be carried a little further, and let us reasonably suppose this small and hitherto nearly invisible object to be an immense globe like our own sun, and surrounded probably with planets and satellites depending upon their centre for light and heat; what would be the effect of this sudden conflagration on them? It makes one almost shudder at the idea of a system of worlds being annihilated at once without warning. But such must doubtless be the fact. We, however, in this quiet world of ours, can scarcely, perhaps, realize such a catastrophe; but were our sun, which is only a star analogous to

To Subscribers.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.—When the Preacher receives the name of a subscriber, he should receive the money with it, and a three cent stamp, for the purpose of sending both name and money at the same time in the same letter. Suppose the letter never arrives—the loss is ours; and the subscriber receives his paper. We hope that our agents and subscribers will see the force of these views—we feel them.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—The next session of this Conference will be held at New Iberia.

MOBILE CONFERENCE.—We refer our readers to our correspondent for the news of the first three days from this Annual Conference.

It met on Dec. 11th, at Marion, Alabama.

Also, we present a short letter from the MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE. The appointments are also in the present issue.

SPAIN WILLING TO SELL CUBA AND PORTO RICO.—A cable dispatch to New York dated Havana, the 12th inst., says:

Authentic information from Spain is received with the important intelligence that the Spanish Government has made a formal offer to the American Minister at Madrid to sell Cuba and Porto Rico to the American Government for $150,000,000 in gold.

The terms of the sale are $50,000,000 in gold, to be paid in cash on the signing of the treaty and formal delivery of the island to the authorities of the United States; the second $50,000,000 in gold to be paid one year thereafter, and the third instalment of $50,000,000 in gold, to be paid at the end of six years.

Great excitement prevails over the news, the extinction of slavery being one of the consequences of the sale.

The national pride is disposed to grumble a little over the transfer, but the general feeling, except among the oldest families, is one of satisfaction. It is of course known that the the owners of slave property will be fully compensated out of the purchase money.

An American company has already purchased an island near New Vitas, for the purpose of colonizing thirty thousand acres. With the sale of Cuba and the abolishment of human servitude on the island, the slave traders' last hopes are gone. It is regarded here as a certain bargain, that will be completed forthwith.

There was a severe and destructive storm in Chattanooga recently, which demolished several houses. Among them the freight depot of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad.

The farmers in a portion of Iowa are said to have over 100,000 bushels of surplus wheat stored away.

CHRISTMAS.

The sons of God shouted for joy when the foundations of the earth were laid, and the Saviour was born amid the songs of myriads of mighty angels. The interest of that wonderful night increases with every return of time in its golden orbit. The canopy of night, the watching shepherds, the flocks in dosing slumber, the shrouded plain, the gathering dew—then a sudden placid splendor encircles the watching group—a Seraph appears standing before them, and graciously says—for their blood stops with fright—Fear not; behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour which is Christ the Lord. While these wondrous words pass his lips a multitude of holy ones hover the spot. It was a wondrous picture, those rudely clad shepherds, standing in alarm, in that irradiating circle of glory, their forms in the foreground looking at the Archangel who brought the Message. Now suddenly he is reinforced by twelve legions of lofty powers who alight gleaming with the beauty of morning stars; as if an arc of Heaven, with all its life and light, had been in a moment lifted out of its place and transported near to Bethlehem. To this enrapturing sight there was added the entrancing song and shout of purest symphony, such as is only heard in Heaven when all the harps of the angels are employed. The notes high and clear, swell higher, sweeter, clearer, on hill and field, and river.—

Their echoes roll from soul to soul, And grow forever and forever.

One of the poets says that this choral song was but the overflowing of the anthem 'Glory to God in the highest!' which at that moment was pealing through the upper arches.

'Twas more than Heaven could hold;
'Down through the portals of the sky The impetuous torrent ran.'

And it may be that it was but the spray of the wild cataract of glory which, in that hour, leaped from the Throne to the Universe.

The shepherds themselves were no strangers to music, but never since the days of David, when he, a shepherd boy, watched his gentle flock upon this very ground and filled with pipe and flute the undulating field, had such melody been heard. Scarcely had the echoes of the sublime choir reluctantly died away, when the inspired shepherds started for the village. It was not far; the night had just yielded to the light natural and supernatural of that glad morn. They were in search of the new-born King, and by direction sought first for the place where the sleeping infant lay—for the angel said it was a 'manger'! Sure enough there they found him, the sweet unconscious one, lying in a little box-like manger made of unhewn stones and plastered within; the first and probably the last time that ever a newly born babe was laid in such a cradle. The most beautiful thing in the world is light shining through human flesh—and O, the roseate glory of that 'first-born' child! Even the sight and singing of the angels did not so transport these Shepherds. They now told every one of all that they had witnessed, and broke forth themselves in praises, 'glorifying God,' and so returned with singing to their own homes.

While these events were transpiring another train had been started by the Father of men and angels. There had arrived all of a sudden in Jerusalem the Magi, full of strange and pressing enquiry—'Where is he that is born King of the Jews?' and they added the reason which had urged them to come from the far Orient in search of him; 'For we have seen his Star in the East.' No spirit of idle curiosity had moved these Herods of the royal Son, but they brought the first sheaf of the Gentile world to lay it at the feet of the Holy King.—'We have come,' said they, 'to worship Him.' A new star had guided them but had suddenly disappeared. Their enquiry moved Herod, and he gathered those who were in authority 'the Chief Priests and Scribes' to answer. The prophecies supplied the place of the star, and pointed to Bethlehem. When the Wise Men took that way, the Star again took the place of the prophecy and guided to the house in which the babe then lay; and now with gentle ray its silvery light shone full upon the face of the 'young child.' It was He! And 'they fell down and worshipped him,' as He there lay in the lap of Mary; and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts: gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

Yes, there lay that beauteous holy babe in the lap of the pure young mother, his brow bathed in the mystic radiance of the New Star; and around him there knelt those hoary-headed strangers from the East, with adoring awe contemplating the precious 'gift of God.' They saw there the initial point of the new line—the fresh Adam of a race of sons. Not, as in the first paradise, amid bowers and bloom, did this new Man appear, lying on a bed of roses, but in the arms of maternal love and pride. These sudden arrivals of rustic Shepherds and learned Magi, the bewildering light and joy of that first week, filled the mind of Mary—her heart was already full. 'She kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart.' It was her own child upon whom so much glory dawned, and she now knew that God had 'regarded the low estate of his hand-maiden,' and that from henceforth all generations should call her blessed.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

FOURTH DAY.

Bishop Paine in the chair. The religious interests of the colored people came under the review of the Conference upon the report of the special committee, and was read by J. O. Enqua, Esq., Lay Representative. It recommends the plan of the General Conference for rehabilitating this part of the Church.

The committee on Education reported through its chairman, the Rev. Baxter Clegg. The report of the Board of Managers of the MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE was received presenting a favorable view of that Institution. The places of the Rev. Linus Parker and Dr. J. Wilder were declared vacant, and the Rev. B. F. Alexander and Mr. John Holmes were appointed by the President of the Conference managers of that college in their places. The conduct of the Institution during the year 1867 was approved.

The report of the committee of the Board of Trustees of PIERCE and PAINE COLLEGE was received, and among other resolutions one was passed appointing Rev. J. S. Lane special agent of the Conference, with instructions, for the affairs of that Institution, and for collecting the amount due it. The Conference also approved the conduct of the College, and appointed the Board of Trustees, equally of ministers and laymen. The report of the former agent of the College, the Rev. B. F. Alexander, was read and approved.

The Homer College was reported to be in operation. The former Board of Trustees was reappointed and after some discussion, the P. Elder was appointed to look after its financial interests, and if possible raise the amount necessary to relieve it of debt.

The chairman of the committee on Ministerial Support reported fifty per cent. dividend upon the claims of superannuated preachers, and Widows and Orphans of traveling preachers. The amount of the Bishops claim was stated to be—$1170.—The amount collected towards this claim was reported to be $678.90, leaving a deficiency of $491.05. To meet this deficiency it was 'Resolved; that it shall be the duty of each preacher in charge, to take up a collection before the 1st of March in all those congregations where such a collection, has not already been taken up during the past year and forward the same to Dr. J. C. Keener as soon as possible.' It was also determined (for all Conferences are fruitful in many resolutions) that each member of the Church should be taught that he owes a debt personally to the Bishop, as well as to the Preacher in Charge, or the P. Elder of the Circuit. Upon motion the chairman was instructed to divide the Bishop's claim among the several Districts of the Conference, and each Presiding Elder was directed to apportion the amount set down to his District, among the several circuits and stations that compose it. This was subsequently done by the Chairman, as follows: New Orleans District, $450—Opelousas District—$150—Alexandria District $50—Shreveport District $150—Ouachita District $250—Lake Providence District—$150. Now it remains to be seen whether any of the Presiding Elders will come up next year with the same beggarly account of emptiness that several Districts have sent up this year—as if Bishops could live on honor and air. It is due to the New Orleans District to state that two-thirds of the whole amount raised for the Bishops was raised in its bounds. But with this exception it would seem that the claims of these holy and venerable ministers had been overlooked by our people. Yet these men of God have labored this year as severely as any in the vineyard. Several of them are old men who have spent the best of their days and the pride of their strength in ministering the word of God to the people of these Southern States. It is simply because the matter is not brought fairly before the members of our Church, that the support of these revered and beloved servants of God is not forthcoming. We know enough of the slipshod way in which many Methodist Preachers do their work to warrant us in the assertion. The amount due by a circuit should be put down in the STEWARD'S ESTIMATES, at the beginning of the year and provided for at all hazard. Times have so changed that our church cannot any longer afford the luxury of men who are great only as preachers, but are worthless out of the pulpit in attending to the details of the pastorate. Our people are poor; if the opportunity is not afforded them frequently to pay a little at a time, henceforth no interest of the Church can be supported. Missionary Cause, Bishop's Claim, Widows and Orphans per cent., Preacher and Elder, will all go by the board, if the minister in charge is too literary, or too sedentary, or too professional to carry about a subscription paper. St. Paul always had a collection on hand. It is one of the marks of an Apostle.

CENTENARY COLLEGE.
The interests of Centenary College were brought before the Conference in an able speech by the Rev. Dr. Watkins. After a full discussion it was 'Resolved, that we, the subscribers, members of the Louisiana Conference, promise to be responsible for the sum of twenty dollars each for the purpose of raising a Sustaining Fund for the Centenary College; and to use our influence with the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to swell the list of subscribers to this fund, to be paid during the year to the President of the Board of Trustees, Dr. J. C. Keener. And that the Secretary be instructed to prepare a copy of this resolution for the signatures of the members of the Conference.' This resolution was intended to be an introduction to such a fund as has been raised in the Georgia and Alabama Conferences, for the support of the Conference Literary Institution.

LAY REPRESENTATIVES.
The Committee appointed to prepare a plan for the election of Lay Representatives, reported the following plan which was adopted.
1. That each Quarterly Conference of each District shall nominate by ballot one Lay Representative.
2. That at some time during the year, the Presiding Elder shall call a meeting of the Quarterly Conferences in his District; which meeting shall elect by ballot four of the said nominees to be the Representatives of the said District to the ensuing session of the Louisiana Annual Conference.

The Committee on Memoirs, being ready to report, the Conference sang, 'How rich thy bounty King of kings!'

After which memoirs were read of the Revs. David Kinnear, Robert R. Alexander, and Leopold Lonz. These holy men had passed a way to Heaven during the year. The sentiments, emotions, and words which marked their exit were sublimely assuring to their friends and their brethren of the supporting power of the Saviour in the hour of death. Their dying messages and praises were like the stones taken from the middle of the Jordan in evidence of its safe passage. One could not wish or imagine any bliss surer.

The Sabbath evening was set apart for the Missionary Meeting. Bishop Paine, and Dr. Walker addressed the meeting. Both speeches were exactly after the true style of missionary platform effort, reasonable, sprightly, impassioned. The congregation had been of late reaped and gleaned, but yielded to these masters of speech several hundred dollars. There were no 'propositions'—the stern poverty of our preachers, for the first time in the history of our missionary society, had, like a Texas norther, chilled, and dried up the genial current of an Itinerant's pocketbook. We saw the poor fellows keeping down those impulses which never before could be checked by any leanness of purse either past, present, or prospective.

FIFTH DAY.
Resolutions were passed strengthening the hands of the agent of the N. O. Depository, the Rev. R. J. Harp, recommending the Home Monthly, the S. S. Visitor, and our own ADVOCATE. We were glad to see how sincerely the preachers wished as well, and we hear that a like spirit is shown by the members of the Mississippi Conference. As this is a wide field, and we cannot trust our own feelings to enter it, the reader must supply as vividly as he can, the many good things that might be said of this paper, and believe that our friends said them; for if anything can stir the ether, the lightning, and the dew, that are supposed to enter largely into the brain and heart of every true Editor it is the kindly notice of the Methodist Preachers. So we pass on.

THE WIDOWS' AND ORPHANS' PER CENT. was by vote declared to be four per cent. for 1868.
Three colored men, Warren Williams, Cyrus Alexander, and William Culpepper, having been well recommended as suitable persons, were elected and ordained Deacons.
The Rev. F. A. Rawson, was elected to preach the next Conference Sermon.
The chairman of the committee on Sabbath-Schools reported that in many parts of the country the Sabbath School can be employed advantageously to the Church and the community in affording to children the opportunity of obtaining the rudiments of an education. That, as originally, it is desirable that we improve the opening which the poverty of our people presents for the multiplication of Sunday-schools within the bounds of this Conference. That this is presented as an inducement for establishing such schools in addition to all other important considerations which move us, as ministers, to their support. We like this suggestion much; and it tallies with the earnest request from a brother in an overflowed district who urged the starting a Sabbath-school, because, said he, it is our only chance for teaching the children to read.

RESOLUTIONS OF THANKS.
The Conference passed the following: 'Resolved that the thanks of the Louisiana Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, South, are hereby tendered to the Officers and Proprietors of the steamboats 'Iberia,' 'Latawana,' 'Vicksburg,' and 'Wild Wagoner,' also to J. B. Price, Esq., stage owner, the Attapas and Mail Transportation Company, and the Opelousas Rail Road for their very generous offer to return the ministers of this Conference to their homes free of pay.' Also a vote of thanks was unanimously passed 'to the citizens of New Orleans, for the hospitable and courteous manner in which they have entertained the members of the Conference during its session.'

The First Friday in November was appointed as a day of fasting and prayer, 'that the blessing of God may be invoked upon the Church in our bounds, and upon the ensuing session of the Conference.'

The minutes were then read up; when the Bishop arose and prefaced the reading out the appointments with those cheering, brotherly words which never fall more gratefully or seem more refreshing than upon such an occasion. Then he gave out;

'Jesus, the truth and power divine, Send forth these Messengers of thine; and O how heartily and clearly was it sung by those servants of God! After prayer by the Rev.
N. A. Cravens, the appointments were read out.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.
MONTGOMERY, Ala., Dec. 16, 67.
MR. EDITOR: The Montgomery Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, South, closed its fourth session on Monday, Dec. 9th, in Opelika, Ala. The members were nearly all present notwithstanding the scarcity of money, and the general depression. Some borrowed money, others travelled in the old style, tarrying each night with some good old saint who received them in the name of the Lord. One or two had been robbed on the route, yet all seemed cheerful and full of hope.

Bishop Wightman was with us in gentleness, suggesting here, directing there, and listening to the humblest member with the deference which always impresses the observing and thoughtful. The only objection presented was this: We did not make haste slowly.

The Bishop's sermon on Sabbath was full of comfort, and many a heart realized a new energy and gathered fresh inspiration from its stirring truths.

Dr. Sumners visited our Conference, and by invitation gave us his discourse on 'The Church.' It was instructive and satisfying.

A. H. Redford, Book Agent, was with us two or three days working and talking in a way which won our hearts. Many a new interest awakened in our Publishing House.

A committee was created for the purpose of considering the question of establishing a Book Depository and Weekly paper within our bounds, and to report at the next session. The proposition was discussed at some length—the opposition was decided, but the committee was appointed. What it will propose no one can divine.

Five were admitted on trial, and two received by transfer: three located, two discontinued, three transferred, and two died.

There is an increase of white members of one thousand and eighty: a decrease of colored members of one thousand six hundred and eighty-three. Also, a decrease of twenty-four local preachers.

Sunday School interest in a good condition. There is an increase of sixty-five schools, three hundred and ninety-eight teachers, and three thousand five hundred and sixteen scholars.

Our collections were smaller than last year. For missions, there were nearly three thousand dollars collected; for superannuated widows, orphans, and Bishops' aid, a fraction under thirty hundred dollars. Some of the preachers made no collections.

They were required, by vote of the Conference, to make collections in the month of February, and send the money to the Chairman of the Financial Board.

I send you a list of the appointments. Yours, J. M.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Dec. 21, 1867.

We have but few changes to notice in the general market since our last issue. We have again to notice only a moderate business in the wholesale trade, but the sales of our leading staple have been to an increased extent, at prices still more in favor of buyers, on Saturday factors being compelled to make further concessions, in consequence of a decline reported at Liverpool and the course of foreign exchange; but at an advance since of about 1/2c on Friday's figures. Sugar has come forward more freely, and met a fair demand at about previous rates. The receipts of Molasses, also, have been liberal, and gone off readily, without any marked variation in prices. Nothing of any moment has been done in Tobacco, and the movement in Western Produce has been of about the usual extent, and generally at previous rates.

COTTON.—We stated in our last report that the market closed at reduced rates, under the influence of the accounts noticed above, after further giving way 1/2c, prices have recovered the falling off, and closed at a net advance on Friday's prices to nearly or quite the same extent, while the business has been on quite a liberal scale. On Saturday the market opened under the depressing influence of 3/4d decline reported at Liverpool and increased heaviness in foreign exchange, but the demand continued active, although at easier rates, and 4500 bales changed hands. On Monday, with an ample supply offering the business was on a more liberal scale, running up 7100 bales, which is much the largest business reported this year, while prices exhibited unusual irregularity, all desirable lists, particularly if of good staple, commanding full prices; and in many cases 1/2c advance, while other descriptions sold partly at previous rates, and partly at figures showing an actual falling off from Saturday's figures. Tuesday the supply having been much reduced by the heavy business of the day previous, there was much less scope afforded to buyers. The demand was, moreover, checked by the stringent pretensions of factors who claimed a material advance on previous rates; but still buyers kept on with a fair degree of spirit, and the sales comprised 4300 bales, mostly at prices indicating a further improvement of 1/2c.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 15,900 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export. The receipts proper since Friday evening embrace 20217 bales, against 13260 during the corresponding period last week showing an increase of 6957 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 177,392 bales, against 269,364 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 48,907 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 27,436 bales to Great Britain, of 6774 to France, and an increase of 44,309 to other foreign ports.

We now modify our quotations as follows:

SUGAR.—A good demand prevailed, at full prices, on Saturday and Monday, and the receipts have sold quite readily. Tuesday there was a falling off in the demand, and a consequent decline in prices of fully 1/2c per lb.

MOLASSES.—An active demand has prevailed, at full prices, since our last review, and pretty much all the receipts have been sold.

FLOUR.—The market has continued dull and unchanged since our last review. There has again been some demand for Superfine, Single and Double Extra, which are scarce, but Treble and Choice Extra are in abundance and difficult of sale, even at very low figures.

PORK.—The market is dull and prices have declined at least 75c per bbl.

BACON.—The market is well supplied, but there is little or no demand by the trade at wholesale.

THE BEST ARE THE CHEAPEST.
THE MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS have just been awarded a FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the Grand Exposition in Paris, in competition with instruments from the best makers of all countries. This makes over seventy highest premiums awarded them within a few years. Testimonials from more than three hundred of the most prominent musicians in the country that these instruments are unequalled are published in the circulars of Mason & Hamlin.
Observe that dealers in musical instruments are strongly tempted to recommend as equal to the best, those instruments on which they can make the largest profit. The prices of M. & H. are fixed and invariable. They cannot afford the large discounts made by manufacturers of inferior work, many of whom sell at 40 to 50 per cent discount.
At the prices at which they are sold, the Mason & Hamlin Organs are believed to be not only the best but the cheapest instruments of their class. Send for circular, with particulars, to MASON & HAMLIN, 596 Broadway, N. Y., or 154 Tremont street, Boston.

William Mason & E. S. Hoadly's New Method for the Pianoforte.
Already a second edition of this new work is ready and nearly sold in advance. It is new in method and matter, embracing modern exercises and expeditious short heretofore presented, while its selection of Exercises, Recreations, and Pieces, mostly from composers of recognized eminence, is unusually large and very choice. This is the first instruction book to include the technicals of modern pianoforte playing. It has a full elucidation and illustration of Mr. Mason's new system of Accidental Treatment of Exercises, by which the attention of the pupil is almost compelled, and careless practice is rendered nearly impossible, while not only the hands, but also the mind, taste, and artistic perceptions are cultivated and trained.
It is eminently a practical work, the result of long and most successful experience in the actual business of pianoforte teaching. It is carefully progressive, very clear and perspicuous and full in its explanations and directions, illustrated by cuts and diagrams, and is adapted to the use of young beginners as well as of those who have made progress. 240 pp. large 4to. Price $4. Two editions are published; one with American and one with European Fingering. Care should be taken to designate which is wanted. Published by

BEYOND THE STORM.
The Sabbath at Home.
The sun goes down at evening tide
The blessed sky of lurid light;
The stars red-eyed along the lands,
And then comes night.
The wind wakes with shuddering sighs,
And walls by roof and window-pane;
And suddenly from spongy clouds Down pours the rain.
The dim black-branched trees Sway to and fro like witch's arms, And their spindles, and weaving weird Fantastic charms.
The meadow lands the long lush grass Lies low upon the sodden ground, And in hedge corners withered leaves Whirl round and round.
The apples drop from orchard trees,
The wet leaves tremble know no rest,
And fluttering birds, with frightened eyes, Seek their nest.
The village streets are empty all,
The traveler's step is heard no more,
The ringing sign, and clattering slate,
And clanking door.
The chamber-dull of lonely house
The sick man lies with deep-drawn breath, And in confusion seems to be The wings of Death.
The edges of the tomb
The hard-frozen ivy sorrows and creaks; And a church spire the weather-cock Tosses round with shrieks.
The rivers fill with yellow foam,
And eddies through their rocky course, And add to the tumultuous time Their chorus hoarse.
The sunbeams on the creviced cliff,
The sunbeams on the hoary crag, And down a shunder as they meet The spray's swift drag.
Along the cold gray broken shore The surges thunder up and down; The backward from the rugged rocks They fairly drain.
Upon black seas the tumbling ships Drive on before the driving gale, With bows deep plunged in mounded waves,
And rest, wet sail.
Now, blowing winds! beyond the clouds Glimpses of heaven's clear vault are seen;
And there the steadfast planets burn,
And calm serene.
So above this stormy world,
In gusty sighs, its showering tears,
And a land where life is calm,
And free from fears.
One day—so the Promise speaks—All cloudy storms shall surely cease, And those who trust and wait shall win Borne Peace.

A Desirable Holiday Present.

There was a time—and not very long ago either—when Sewing Machines, with all their acknowledged utility, were among the luxuries of social life. The few possessed them and expatiated upon their wonderful charms with tireless loquacity and dilated eyes, while the many looked upon them as marvels of scientific and inventive genius far beyond their reach. That time has passed by most unmistakably; and to-day the best beloved coadjutor of the residing genius of every well-ordered household is the Sewing Machine.
But there are so many different Sewing Machines, the people say, all putting forth indisputable claims to pre-eminent excellences, that we are in a quandary, and don't know which to buy. To choose rationally in such a matter is certainly important, and we may be able to assist some of those who are unable to decide for themselves. At any rate we will say frankly that the GROVER & BAKER Sewing Machine must be regarded as one of the most perfect, complete and desirable in the market. It is light, graceful, simple; it sews rapidly, undeviatingly, surely; its stitch is compact and elegant, and never gives out; it does everything that can be done by any Sewing Machine, and excels all others in its adaptability for embroidery. The specimens of this machine of needle-work are as wonderful as they are exquisite. The most dexterous and most skillful hand, inspired to labor by the fondest motives and most ingenious imagination, could not hope to execute such work, although it might devote many days and weeks of wearing labor. In addition to recommendations like these, it must by no means be forgotten that the GROVER & BAKER Sewing Machine was the only one which received, at the Paris Universal Exposition, the Cross of the Legion of Honor, that most coveted of all prizes among exhibitors. The thousands who are looking about for the best Sewing Machine as a holiday present for some dear friend, or some needy and deserving poor person, will do well to lose sight of such facts as these.—Home Journal.

THE CHINA MISSION.

ABINGDON, Va., December 10, 1867.
MR. EDITOR: I have received several letters from China within the last week. Our brethren there are distressed beyond measure for want of funds. They have received but one small remittance this year from the Board. Bro. Allen writes that he sees no means of keeping up even the name of the mission unless the church acts promptly for their relief. The field was never more encouraging. Several candidates have recently been baptized, and others are under instruction. Now will the church refuse to encourage and aid these faithful brethren? Can the church prosper at home while so shamefully neglecting the cause of Christ among the heathen? Can we not support one small foreign mission? But I cannot write on this subject without a degree of feeling I do not like to express.
Bro. Lambuth writes that several native Christians have died within the last two or three years, all giving satisfactory evidence that God was with them in the last trial. Thank God, our native Christians die well! He mentions the death of an old man whom I knew well, and who, when I left China, was a member of our little Sabbath school, seeking like a child to learn the blessed truths of the Gospel. When he came to die all was bright. His faith in Christ as the Redeemer of the world grew stronger and stronger as he neared the dark river, and his last hours were spent in rejoicing. He was seventy years old before he ever heard of the Gospel. Others declared, when dying, that not a fear disturbed them. God does, I think, vouchsafe an unusual measure of grace to the converts from heathenism in the dying hour. Satan wishes, doubtless, to overwhelm their souls in the fearful struggle; and were they not sustained in an unusual degree, would sink in despair, and thus give the heathen cause to triumph; but, thank God, he enables them to die gloriously in the midst of their unbelieving families and neighbors. It is a marvelous thing among the heathen to see a man willing to die; but to see one anxious to depart, and joyfully embracing death, astonishes them beyond measure. Heathenism furnishes no consoling hope to the dying—all is dark uncertainty. No "shining shore" beyond cheers, the despairing eyes of the dying Buddhist. They look with great interest upon the testimony of Christian converts in this particular, and God has honored his grace in the death of every one whom he has called away from the infidel church in China. Our sainted Liew, and others from our little communion at Shanghai, are now with God and the angels. Will those who profess to have no interest in our China mission think of these glorified ones, and say our labor has been in vain! I hope to meet my brothers and sisters from China on the sunny plains of the heavenly Canaan. Oh! it will be sweet to think, when I meet them, that I ever suffered, ever labored, for their salvation.
Continue, my dear brother, to write and speak for our dear China mission. "It is God's cause." It is for the blessed Saviour, and for the souls of men for whom he died, that you speak. God bless you, and God bless every one who thinks, or prays, or talks for the conversion of the heathen world.
Your brother in Christ, W. G. E. CUNNINGHAM.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

MORGANTON, N. C., December 16, 1867.
MR. EDITOR: The South Carolina Conference met in this romantic mountain town, and found itself among warm, generous and hospitable homes. Bishop Doggett was present from the opening of our session, and presided with his characteristic care, deliberation and urbanity. He charmed all our hearts as a president, Bishop, minister and man. The business of the Conference was disposed of carefully, and every interest received proper and thorough attention.
Large crowds attended the sessions of the Conference, as well as the preaching. Numbers from the surrounding country came in their wagons and tented during the session, and as a spirit of concord marked all the business of Conference, I think the most pleasant impression was made upon the minds of the community.
Four were admitted on trial and five continued on trial. Three traveling and three local preachers were ordained deacons. Six traveling and five local preachers were ordained elders, eleven were made supernumerary, and eight placed in a supernumerary relation. The ADVOCATE and other periodicals received due attention. Bro. Burke, from Macon, Georgia, in behalf of Bro. Redford, urged the claims of the Southern Methodist Publishing House. The statistics were more accurately obtained than at any former session, and developed a decrease from former statements of ten local preachers, nine hundred and forty-four white, and seven thousand four hundred and forty-two colored members. Our colored membership is rapidly withdrawing from us, and the saddest statements as to depreciated morals and increasing superstitions among them reached us. We are hoping, however, that with the diminution of political violence there will at least be restored relations of harmony and good will.
A gracious religious influence attended the entire session. The preachers and laymen present seemed to keep in mind the disciplinary injunction: "Have a special care to set God always before you." The preaching was "in demonstration of the spirit and of power." This was the case in a remarkable degree under the sermons of Bishop Doggett and Dr. Shipp on Sunday. The memorial services were held just previous to the announcement of the appointments. After singing the 73rd hymn—"What though the conquering arm of Death," etc.—the memoirs were read, and were followed by fitting tributes from the special friends of the deceased. W. Crook, T. R. Walsh and W. A. Hemmingway died during the year. All this was a most appropriate appeal to the preachers to zeal and faithfulness, and inspired the Bishop's address which followed. I have never seen the preachers receive their appointments with such glowing countenances and exhibitions of joy. A divine radiance seemed to settle upon all present. After, by a unanimous vote, ordering an adjournment sine die, the Bishop adjourned this delightful session with the benediction. Your's truly,
F. ASBURY MOOD,
Secretary.

LETTER FROM BISHOP M'YRE.

SEGUIN, Texas, Dec. 3, 1867.
MR. EDITOR:—I send you a list of the Appointments of West Texas Conference, which closed its second session in Seguin, Dec. 2; also, a few other items of interest.
I will not say now all I have to say concerning this broad and beautiful country. But this Conference is one of special interest to our Church. It, with the Northwest Texas Conference, holds the frontier. It is a field of great, almost romantic gospel enterprise, and danger, and hardship. The men who compose its itinerant corps have endured nobly, and they are willing to do and suffer. The Church must help them to hold and extend this frontier. Men and money must be supplied from abroad. The Domestic Mission Board can do almost nothing compared with the demands upon it. Will not the Parent Board send help? We want a pastor—single man—for Indianola. We have a good house there, and his support guaranteed. It is an important and growing place, and we ought not to lose a year, or a day, in occupying it. We want a man for Brownsville—a town of four or five thousand inhabitants on the frontier of Mexico, and not a Protestant church open in it. We are reaching out toward El Paso—six hundred miles beyond San Antonio. Our people are settling out there, and calling for preachers. Had we the man and a little money we could establish a strong and soon a self-sustaining Church in Arizona. A beginning has been made, and I have assurances that after the first year it would be self-sustaining. Who will volunteer for these fields? Who will go, and who help to send?
Yours,
H. N. McFARLANE.

The great objection to smart children is that when they commence having whiskers they leave off having brains. By forcing children, you get so much into their heads that they become cracked in order to hold it.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

MT. LEBANON.

Mr. Editor: It has been my privilege recently to spend a few days in the beautiful and quiet little town of Mt. Lebanon, and have concluded to furnish you and your readers with some items of interest which I saw and heard while there.

Methodism is still alive there, and though it breathes "almost noiselessly," yet it breathes easily and freely. Bro. Kimball, the able and efficient pastor, is at his post, doing the work of a minister faithfully and successfully, having the entire confidence of all who know him.

Our church in Mt. Lebanon is, I learn, not yet free from debt, and owing to the greediness of the cotton worms, will not be entirely untrammelled this season, unless, perchance, some kind friends manifest considerable liberality in behalf of our beloved Methodism there, which, I learn, the brethren are expecting through the instrumentality of Bishop Marvin, who has promised to exert himself in their behalf. These brethren, Mr. Editor, ought to be relieved. They have accomplished more than the most sanguine could have expected, and now really need some assistance.

The membership of the M. E. Church South there is gradually increasing in numbers, and, from what we witnessed while there, we believe in spirituality. The fiery trials through which they have recently passed have doubtless been in the providence of God permitted for their spiritual benefit, and have, no doubt, been thus received by them.

They are firmly united in the bonds of Christian love and affection, and as union is strength, Methodism rides prosperously over every wave of opposition.

The doctrines of Methodism being founded on the words of eternal truth, are firm and steadfast; consequently every attempt at their overthrow has been and will continue to be futile—has given and will continue to give momentum to their already rapid dissemination.

Methodism, save its polity, has received the practical indorsement of the present editor of the Louisiana Baptist, and that, too, through the columns of his paper, which, of course, I suppose he did in the honesty of his heart. This may seem a little incredible, but I have both seen and read the article, and will take great pleasure in furnishing you with a copy of the same if you desire it.

The citizens of Mt. Lebanon and all the readers of the Louisiana Baptist have recently been highly entertained with some leaders on the subjects of "Preaching Christ" and "Protracted Meetings," in the first of which there are some wholesome suggestions with regard to the subject matter of Gospel preaching, and against the substitution of noise, etc., for the preaching of Christ, all of which I heartily indorse, though I have never known any one, I believe, who did this intentionally. I am also opposed to the substitution of an ordinance, or the mode of administering an ordinance, for the doctrines of the cross. Jesus and his crucifixion should be the theme of the minister.

In the leader on "Protracted Meetings" there is a warning to Baptist ministers against boisterous preaching, (just as though the author always preached in whispered tones,) and the imitation of Armenian preachers by addressing themselves to the animal feelings of their congregations. I wonder what is meant by the "animal feelings" to which the author alludes. Heavens priests, we are informed, do this.

An allusion is also made to the noisy meetings of Methodists; but, notwithstanding the great hue and cry against these noisy meetings, I have never known an applicant for membership in the Baptist or any other church rejected because of his having been converted in one of these "noisy" Methodist meetings. They are at par anywhere.

ITINERANT.

Gainesville and Soosha-Mobile Conference.

Mr. Editor:—We are not able to report such extensive revivals, and large additions to the Church, as are reported from other fields of labor; though we have not been destitute of the reviving influences and converting power of the Holy Spirit. The large amount of sickness that has prevailed for several months past, has almost entirely prevented the holding of protracted meetings. I have tried to be faithful in preaching and pastoral visiting, and trust that my labors have not been in vain.

Complaints of hard times, and depression in monetary affairs, appear to have a depressing effect upon the spiritual, as well as temporal interests of the Church.

Why should not worldly disappointments drive us nearer to God, and our very misfortunes prove a means of grace? What we need is more of the mind of Christ, and a greater disposition to "lay up treasure where moth and rust do not corrupt." Yours in Christ.

J. C. HUCKABEE.

Waterproof—Louisiana Conference.

Mr. Editor:—Bro. W. G. McGanghey has just held his last Quarterly Meeting for the Lake Providence District at this place.

The Services were continued from Saturday, 23d November, till Sunday, 1st inst., and resulted in ten bright conversions, and an addition of thirteen members to the M. E. Church, South.

Bro. W. W. Drake of the Mississippi Conference, was present most of the time, and I hope that his earnest preaching, his warm exhortations and faithful prayers, will long be remembered by this people.

The Church here is much revived. J. F. WYNN.

Columbus Circuit—Mobile Conference.

Mr. Editor:—We closed a meeting at Berca, on this week, a few days ago, at which there were about 20 conversions, and 17 accessions to the Church. Your brother,

G. HAWKINS.

Southern Enterprise—Brooms.

LAUREL HILL, La., Dec. 13.

Mr. Editor: In your paper of the 7th inst. I saw an article about making Brooms in the South. I am pleased to tell you that it is the intention of myself and another party to go into that business here next year. I have the machinery, which is quite simple, now under construction. We intend to raise a crop of broom-corn on the place, and purchase all that may be produced in our section. I am satisfied that Brooms can be made as cheap here as at the North, and the market is wide. I am well acquainted with the manufacturing of brooms, also of the machinery for making them, which is simple and cheap. For further information, address E. E. B. Laurel Hill P. O., West Feliciana Parish, La. [Send a sample.—Editor.]

FROZEN PLANTS.—When plants in pots become frozen, they may often be saved by judicious treatment, if the freezing is not very severe. The way to complete the work of the frost is to bring the plant into a warm room, or, still worse, to attempt to thaw it with warm water. Leave it in a cool place where the thawing will be very gradual, and where the sun will not reach it. Trees frozen in transportation are to be treated in a similar manner. Place the box or parcel in a dark, cool cellar, or, if it be not convenient to do that, cover it thickly with straw or coarse hay, or bury it in the earth—any way to avoid a sudden change.

London is sometimes called "The City of Masts."

From the Contemporary Review.

MR. ARNOLD.—No. II.

BY PETER DAYNE.

Mr. Arnold would, he tells us, have been a Christian if he had arrived in the world a few ages sooner. While Christianity was credible, he would so gladly have believed it.

"O, had I lived in that great day, How had its glory new Filled earth and heaven, and caught away My ravished spirit too!"

"No cloister-floor of humid stone Had been too cold for me; For me no Eastern desert lone Had been too far to flee."

"No thoughts that to the world belong Had stood against the wave Of love which set so deep and strong From Christ's then open grave."

"No lonely life had passed too slow When I could hourly see That woe called Form, with head drooped low, Upon the bitter tree."

That is to say, Mr. Arnold pronounces it to be a desirable and blessed thing to be well deceived—to be lapped in sweet delusion. I think it is manlier to hold with Paul that, if Christianity is a dream, the very sweetness of its illusions, the very glory of its dazzling imagery and transporting promises, render those deceived by it the more miserable. Madness, be its vision gay or gloomy, is immediately sad. To be in his right mind is belief in truth, however harsh. But I may be permitted to question the correctness, though I do not in the least question the sincerity of Mr. Arnold's theory, as to what he would have been if he had lived in the early ages of Christianity. May it not be doubted whether he would have cast in his lot with the struggling sect whose reputation was so ambiguous, and which was so largely recruited from the dregs of the people, sinners and publicans, Magdalen and slaves? Is it not, on the whole, more probable that his sensibilities would have been too delicate for such companionship, and that he would have been found cultivating sweetness and light in some refined Gnostic coterie?

Be that as it may, Mr. Arnold has less reason for rejecting Christianity now than we would have had at any period since John the Baptist sent his Disciples to the Master. The early Christians were nearer to the time when Christ hung upon the cross than we are, but they had not such means at their command as we possess of forming a clear and articulate idea of the evidence for that and the accompanying occurrences. Those who, centuries long, had assailed Christianity with the weapons of historical criticism have as good as thrown down their tools, and taken refuge in the abstract assertion that miracle is impossible. They will not admit that Christianity has been proved Divine; but the problem of disproving its historical evidence, without invalidating all proof of occurrences long since past, has baffled them; and in irritated perplexity, remarking with a continental writer that it would be interesting, were it possible, to discover the germ of the Christian fable, they pass on.

But Christianity has lost its power. It is not believed. Practically it is extinct. Is this, I ask in calmness and sobriety, true? To me, looking at the question as boldly, broadly, and soberly as I can, it appears that the aspect of affairs is for Christianity more promising now than it has ever been. Christianity was never so wise and pure—never did Christian zeal burn with so clear and ardent a flame—as at this hour. Monastic Christianity was very narrow and very sickly. Latin Christianity, though one of the most glorious things ever beheld on this earth, was cramped with superstition. Protestant Christianity, as organized at the Reformation, was grievously, inexpressibly injured by the worldliness of its patrons, by the secularism of its arrangements, by the rigidity of its forms, by the scorching intellectualism of its spirit, by the paralyzing influence of its great sin in gnashing its teeth with furious hatred against those who, a few years before, had been companionship with as fellow-Christians. The Christianity which is vital at this hour, the Christianity which more or less inspires devout and intelligent souls in all Churches, and in all civilized nations, is a gentler, purer, more beautiful spirit of moral life than ever in this world breathed in an equal number of human bosoms. Only in these latter days—not is the fact wonderful, for the truth in its simplicity is always the highest and the last attainment of man—have we really learned that toleration, mercy, brotherly kindness, are of the essence of Christianity. True, there is much doubt abroad. But does the thoughtless mind see no meaning, no preciousness, no blessed influence, educating, humanizing, refining, in doubt? Is not doubt the revealer of difficulty, and does it not thus minister to the most delicate sympathy of intellect and of heart? Is it not doubt that casts those side-lights upon dogma, and suggests those reserves and qualifications which must characterize every statement or solution of a complicated question that is delicately and finely true? Doubt is the element of all the most sincere and exquisite action of mind, the mother of intellectual modesty, and manly diffidence, and gracious forbearance. In an age of mature learning and varied speculation like ours, it is no paradox to say that he who has first doubted and then believes, believes best; and scarce a paradox to affirm that he who has never doubted has never believed. I am, of course, aware that there is a habit of affected and feeble dubitation, which is the mere wasting of the intellectual fibre and the fainting of heart and soul; but profoundly true is it that honest, brave, onward-looking doubt is the ally of faith and hope; and the handmaid of love.

Mr. Arnold thinks of Christianity only as a system, feudal or modern, Papal or Protestant. But what if it is more than a system? What if, when the inadequacy of all systems to contain its ethereal spirit had been demonstrated, and the massive ecclesiasticism of the past, like icebergs stranded in a southern clime, were inevitably melting away, its genuine, inborn potency should be then first fully exhibited? What if the race has been gradually, through all these ages, preparing itself to know and appreciate Christianity—the chambers of the human spirit enlarging themselves to receive the heavenly visitant and her angust retinue of truths and ideas? Only in these last days, when the development of material civilization has drawn nations toward each other by the ties of commercial association, has it been surmised by practical men—by at least here and there a practical man—that the morality of the Sermon on the Mount, which, during eighteen centuries of the clangor and torment of war, all Governments and all Churches have assumed to be, on the platform of national life, impracticable, admits of being realized, and that literally the soundest national policy, the policy producing most of benefit for all, is that each nation should seek to promote its neighbor's welfare, and to communicate, instead of monopolizing, the bounty of Providence. What a revolution were that, worth another thousand years of waiting and working, which should see nations changed from fighting nations into co-operating nations!

Mr. Arnold returns, or thinks that he returns, to David. "No man can bear his brother's sin or pay his brother's debt." Hard and cold negation, false and haggard and dead! Man is man in that he hears his brother's sin and pays his brother's debt. All the glory of human tenderness, of human trust, of human fellowship, the deepest music of chivalry, the loveliest devotion of friendship, all that is most sacred and thrilling and beautiful in human story, is destroyed by this attitude of rocky isolation and iron pride. Man to rise must accept help from the meanness of his fellows, and the deepest thinkers of his time—Goethe for one of them—would not agree with Arnold that man is degraded in accepting help from the God-man.

But, after all, is not Christianity practically a failure? "The millions suffer yet." Well, there is truth in that; but let us speak composedly on the subject. Is it true that suffering is a prevailing condition of Christians, either as individuals or as families? Is it not rather a fact that Christian virtue, whether by the calm it breathes within, or by the activity, sobriety, contentment which it enjoins, is the most powerful of talismans for conjuring happiness to the heart and to the hearth? If you look, you will find that the grumblers of the world are not, as a rule, the Christians. Again, is it not one of the hoisly impressions most surely and rapidly dissipated by any real inquisition into the facts of history to suppose that the "millions" were ever so happy? There was possibly—I would not dare to use a stronger word—a brief period in the feudal ages in England when the common people were better off than at present. I think it probable that, in the moments of their highest religious enthusiasm and brightest national prosperity, flying gleams of a happiness beyond the average of that ever enjoyed elsewhere, visited the mass of the Hebrew people. But throughout vast tracts of human history, have not the body of the race been preyed upon by pestilence, famine, the sword, and has not all industry languished, save that ghastly industry in which man sheds his brother's blood? Poets must not put their ideals for facts, or despise that standard of well-being which seems to be appointed for man here below. The common man has over been a toiler; scope to toil, opportunity to earn his bread in the sweat of his brow, this has been all that man in this world ordinarily attains. Horrid hard, bent back, aching limb, had fare, these have been man's lot. He is a true man who does not whine over this; who does not call it suffering; who silently wrestles and endures, and takes with all his heart what happiness is to be had. Labor is not joyous, but grievous; and yet the laboring man, whatever his vocation, is par excellence the healthy and the happy man on this planet.

Mr. Arnold favors us with no information as to how, under the regime of his "mighty wave of thought and joy," the race is to diminish its suffering and widen the margin of its joy. But it is not necessary for Christians to leave this, which is so essential a part of the matter, undetermined. Their programme for the future is simple and distinct. It is to acknowledge fearlessly, faithfully, joyfully, God's Revelation of the Natural, which has been made in these last days, and animating the new machinery with that "enthusiasm of humanity," that passion of infinite kindness, which was first inspired by Christ, and which, though philosophers, before and after Comte, may, to their credit, appropriate it, has never burnt long or bright except on Christian altars, to advance with fresh ardor against the embattled array of human ills.

The toil is not over, the strife and the agony are still to be endured. We fight in the shadow; we march in the night; but starry gleams penetrate the darkness, and streaks of dawn pierce upward from the horizon of the world. We shall not distrust the might of goodness, nor say that God's purpose has failed in the world. Never did so many households worship the Creator in peace and joy, myriads of families, differing in their ecclesiastical badges, joining, morn and eve, in praise and prayer, on the golden plains of England, in the purple valleys of Scotland and Wales, on the emerald slopes of Ireland, beneath the crags of Switzerland, by the rivers of America, unperplexed by scepticism, unconscious of fear, walking in the light toward the perfect day. There are green pastures and still waters where the flocks of God are yet led by His Hand. Never since man joined band with man, and the development of civilization commenced, were the fountains of benevolence so full, so overflowing; never were there so many Christian bands stretched out to succor the orphan, to dry the widow's tear, to make anguish smile, and cheer the bed of death. Sorrow in these days has but to make itself known, and the angels come trooping to its relief—angels none the less real that they look through human eyes and speak in human accents. Never did the Christ walk more gloriously before the nations—never did the "washed Form" exercise a more constraining power—than now. But, as has indeed been the case at all times, the eye of faith can best, or can alone, perceive Him. That Revelation of the Natural, with its startling announcement that our little theories as to the way in which God had revealed Himself to man in Holy Writ were inadequate, has perplexed and disquieted many devout souls. The darling thought, the priceless and ravishing conviction, that, after all generations had been more or less in error, we, with our cut-and-dry inspiration theory, had reached the summit of perfection, and might at last abandon all idea of change or of advance, has been torn from us. The age is one of transition; the ordinance of progress, terrible in the ear of weak humanity, but never to be repealed in this time-world, is sounding loud and clear, as if the angel of the resurrection had put the trumpet to his lips; but there is no cause for apprehension if Christians will but be strong and of good courage, and never forget that to fear truth is to blaspheme God.

CURIOUS CALCULATIONS.—What a noisy creature would a man be were his voice, in proportion to his weight, as loud as that of a locust! A locust can be heard at a distance of one-sixteenth of a mile. The golden wreath is said to weigh but half an ounce, so that a middling-sized man would weigh down not short of four thousand of them, and it must be strange if a golden wreath would not out-weigh four of our locusts. Supposing, therefore, that a common man weighs as much as sixteen thousand of our locusts, and that the note of a locust can be heard one-sixteenth of a mile, a man of common dimensions, pretty sound in wind and limb, ought to be able to make himself heard at the distance of one thousand six hundred miles; and when he sneezed "his house ought to fall about his ears!" Supposing a flea to weigh one grain, which is more than its actual weight, and to jump one and a half yards, a common man of one hundred and fifty pounds, with jumping powers in proportion, could jump twelve thousand eight hundred miles, or about the distance from New York to Coochin China.

The Crimson Umbrella.

In the Methodist Recorder (London) we find the following story of a crimson umbrella, which while it contains a good hit at the public, which is ever ready to meddle with business in no wise concerning it, has a moral also for a class of reformers who are ready to set themselves in opposition to popular opinion in matters involving no question of morals or principle:

"Some years ago an English gentleman arrived at his lodgings in Pall Mall with a bright crimson-colored cotton umbrella in his possession. The article was in common use in the country, which he had come, and he had bought it without thought. A few days' residence in the climate of England naturally occasioned the use of an umbrella, and he looked into the streets of London. It answered his purpose; it kept off the rain, and out here was no particular about the indifference of accidents of color and fabric. But he soon became aware that his appearance was creating a sensation. Every one turned and stared after him; the crossing-sweepers stood aghast and forgot to sweep; then a little crowd gathered about his heels, and people began to give expression to their opinion. Some said he was a foreign spy; some thought he was a Red Republican refugee; but all agreed that he was an exceptional and dangerous person. Being a man of common sense, he at once concluded that this was too heavy a cross to bear for the sake of a five-shilling umbrella; so he folded up the too remarkable article, and submitted to a sprinkling on his way home.

"A few days afterward he was visited by a gentleman not very much in the habit of deferring to public opinion, who was, indeed, rather fond of being remarkable. An English shower was falling when this guest took leave, and the owner of the umbrella, while telling the story, offered him a loan of it. The dauntless dandy laughed at his friend's weakness, and sallied forth canopied by his bright crimson. There was the same sensation. At first he was pleased to be the object of attention. But the crowd began to cumulate; the little boys asked him questions; the cads of the ribusses, always inimical to umbrellas, shouted impertinent observations to him; the crowd pressed upon him, and when people asked each other what was the matter, guesses soon grew into the form of actual assertions. Some times, he was a ticket-of-leave man; sometimes he was identified with some notorious criminal of whom the police were in search. The popular hostility was too great even for him; he returned to his umbrella.

"The original proprietor of his story to many, and among others to a young man of a determined but rather bilious temperament, who did everything to attract the eye, and he had another made upon the same pattern. The companion of his umbrella became more important to him than his business; he was even ready to be a martyr in the cause of bright crimson. The story says that in the end he grew morose, and, as some thought not quite right in his mind, he came into fashion."

The tension of liquids has recently been demonstrated by French philosophers. A rigid thin wire dipped into a liquid of glycerine—comes out with a swelling up the whole interior. It is shown by experiments that this will bear some weight before bursting, and that a loop of silk thread thrown upon it will, as the pressure is increased, be pulled equally in all directions, and made perfectly circular by the tension of the liquid.

There is terrible distress in some parts of Old Virginia. Two hundred and thirty-four farms in one county will soon be sold for arrears of taxes.

SCIENCE IN SCHOOLS.

The full benefit of scientific training can be reaped by those only who have had the opportunity of spending some time in actual original research. Such a mode of instruction cannot of course be looked for in schools. It is quite possible, however, in fact quite practicable, to carry on the teaching of science, in schools or colleges, or elsewhere, in such a way as to make a beginning of those same habits of thought and intellectual qualities which would be more thoroughly brought out by independent research. In physical and experimental science, studied for the sake of learning, the mode of teaching is all in all. As mere necessities, knowledge, science, may be taught in any way; whether by book, by experiments, by Mangnall's "Lardner's Handbooks," or by any other means. So long as the pupils are correct, and the pupil is able to receive them, the end is reached. But such a kind of teaching can never take a high position in schools, and will always remain equally bad, or perhaps worse, in the system, employing a few in not a few places, certain portions of a text-book are read by a class, perhaps repeated upon, construed, one by one, by the teacher, its main portions not unfrequently committed to memory, and then profit of the pupils determined by asking them up in a room and giving them formal printed questions.—This kind of teaching such as this the great secret of successful scientific teaching we take to be, that the teacher should by all possible means endeavor to bring his pupils to face the problems of nature as if they had never been solved before. He should in fact recognize and utilize the actual condition of the pupils' mind. The youth of the individual repeats in outline the outline of the race. To the boy's mind the world is dim and unexplored; he knows nothing of laws or their discovery, nothing of problems or their solution. The object of the teacher should be to seize this state of mind, to make the boy tread, so to speak, in the steps of his ancestors, leading him, however, in a straight line, bringing him on from problem to problem, and encouraging him to solve each, as it were, anew, in the same way that it was solved of old.

For this purpose the study of experimental physics and mechanics seems to be eminently fitted. In its present stage this branch of learning possesses, in a very striking degree, most of the virtues, mingled with as few as possible of the faults of science; it might be called in fact the model science. It is rich in accumulated truths, it has countless fields yet unexplored. It is less rigid and less exclusive than mathematics, it is at the same time free from the uncertainties, the scholastic controversies, and other attractive theories, that still belong to chemistry and biology. It calls to activity all the senses, exercises the reason, and continually makes demands on the watchfulness and sincerity of the learner. The experiments on which its truths are based are clearly, its operations may be conducted without any special apparatus, and its subject-matter, embracing nothing that cannot be brought before both boys and girls. The teacher should be provided with what is technically called a laboratory, a terrible word, however, nothing more than a room fitted up with apparatus, which, in most cases, need be very simple nature only. The teaching of the junior classes, comprising boys up to twelve or fourteen years of age, should be of the elementary character, hardly requiring more than what is familiarly known under the name of "natural lessons." The pupil would be made familiar with the apparatus and general working of the instruments which he will after have to use for definite purposes, and gradually learn the meaning and become accustomed to the use of technical terms. He would become acquainted with the striking properties of solids, liquids, of the air-pump, the tuning fork, the lens, and the pile; and he would be taught to handle the thermometer, the measure, and the balance. In a word, his curiosity would be excited without being gratified, and his faculty of wonder stimulated by novelties, and at the same time chastened by early lessons in exactitude. Though the pupils might be gathered as usual in classes, the instruction given ought to be in great measure individual; and if any schoolmaster thinks that a school of this kind could never be kept in order, such a one knows very little about boys in a state of nature. The danger which the teacher would have chiefly to guard against would be that of allowing his pupils to advance too rapidly to higher studies. He would be frequently tempted by the pointed questions of intelligent lads (and we need hardly say that any check to questions, or stint of answers, would simply be ruinous to the whole scheme of teaching) to push them on to the actual solution of problems before their minds were thoroughly ripe for such an effort, and thus he would run the risk of quenching their ardor by exposing them too early to discouragement and difficulty. As soon, however, as he felt justified, he would begin gradually to lead them on to verify for themselves such physical laws as are most easily established; and he would consider it of supreme importance that each boy should do everything for himself, down to the very arrangement and putting together, nay, in some cases, even the construction, of the apparatus. By this means the scholar would gain a hundredfold the good that he would get by being merely a wondering spectator of the grander performances of his master. He might, for instance, in this way determine the properties of levers, the general laws of the radiation and conduction of heat, of the pressure of the atmosphere, of the reflection and refraction of light, of the conduction of sound, and the chief phenomena of electricity and magnetism. He should be led to attack each problem as if he were about to make a discovery, and be assisted to make written notes and reports of his observations, and to make them as carefully and rigorously as if they were about to receive the honor of publication in the "Philosophical Transactions." It would not be necessary for each boy to pay equal attention to all branches of the science; on the contrary, physics being not, like mathematics, a wall-in court into which there is no entrance save by one or two narrow gates, but a broad open field accessible from almost every point of the compass, it would be possible for the teacher to avail himself judiciously of the likes and dislikes of each individual pupil. Passing on from problem to problem, from observation to observation, from experiment to experiment, each step calling for increased zeal, increased attention, increased accuracy, and increased power of reasoning, the elder student might, if he showed the requisite ability, finish his experimental training by dipping into more speculative studies, and examining at some length, and with care, the general doctrines of Force.

Although the science of experimental physics is undoubtedly in many ways better adapted for educational purposes than any other, and should always form the main part of all scientific studies, it would nevertheless be unwise wholly to exclude other branches of science. Chemistry might be taught in the same way and with very similar results, especially if care were taken to avoid all those oxygen displays and hydrogen explosions, with which, in many ignorant minds, the idea of chemistry is inseparably connected. The pupil should be made conversant with the balance, the test-tube, and the funnel, rather than with pneumatic troughs and bladders of gas, and be brought to think much more of the enormous consequences following upon an error in the second decimal place than of the variety of colors which may be produced by proper reagents in a solution of a salt of iron.

The study of botany seems, at first sight, too pleasant and agreeable a pastime ever to be converted into a rigorous study. Yet, in able hands, it becomes a most powerful means of training the mind to habits of accurate observation, and is an almost indispensable introduction to wider biological studies. It possesses, moreover, this very great advantage, that it needs no apparatus, and can be taught at any time and in any place. Even when flowers are wholly wanting, a handful of leaves will afford material for a dozen lessons. The more complex and less developed sciences of comparative anatomy and physiology would naturally be reserved as special studies for a later period of life; and if a little animal physiology were introduced, it would need to be taught with special care, and entrusted to teachers only whose judgment could be fully relied upon. And this precaution would be necessary, not so much on account of the subject-matter, as because the science of physiology, though of immense value as a means of mental training and of intellectual culture, is at present in so transitional a condition, and so cumbered with vain theories and false conceptions, that by many hands it would be wielded more for harm than for good. Besides there are almost insuperable obstacles to teaching it in a thoroughly practical manner. It is true that by taking Professor Huxley's "Elementary Lessons" as a text-book, both pupil and teacher might be kept from going far astray, for that master in biology has set before his scientific brethren a notable example how, by using the very best of sieves and sifting with diligence, it is possible to rescue a handful of grain from bushels of chaff; still the study of physiology in schools should be put forward with caution, and made to occupy an entirely subsidiary position. The great value of both it and botany would consist in their correcting and enlarging the views and habits that might perhaps arise from too close an attention to physics and chemistry alone.

A scheme of instruction of this kind may seem to many persons to have been taken from the New Atlantis, or to be suited for that pleasant country-house imagined by John Milton, where happy boys were taught to plough and to shoot, as well as to read and write, rather than for the ordinary routine of our present schools. But the difficulties that threaten its introduction vanish away when they are examined in detail. The question of expense, for instance, is answered at once. Any class-room might serve as a laboratory, and even the initial cost of apparatus would not be very great, while the annual outlay for wear and tear would, after a few years' practice, become very slight. Very erroneous ideas on this matter have been spread abroad through the unfortunate habit of incompetent teachers, who demand of authorities large, costly, and complicated pieces of apparatus—often spending pounds on a single showy machine, constructed solely to demonstrate some trifling point—and then break them in attempting to astound their pupils with grand experiments. It must be remembered, too, that as soon as there is a large demand for simple and cheap philosophical apparatus, prices will fall, and the present golden days of instrument-makers will pass away for ever; and if every large school had, what it ought to have, a workshop, a very great deal of what was wanted could be manufactured at home. The question of the distribution of teaching power is equally easy of solution. Only those who have tried it can imagine how easy is the practical experimental fashion of teaching. Certainly an active master could easily superintend the studies of at least a dozen boys at the same time. The essence of the system we have attempted to describe is, that each boy does everything for himself, and that the master does nothing but assist, guide, and correct. Nature, in fact, becomes the schoolmaster, and the teacher has no higher function than that of an humble usher. The natural system of teaching, like other natural systems, brings with it a saving of power, and, were it adopted, much of the energy that is now spent in goading boys into learning might be otherwise employed. At least there would be no lack of good teachers when science had once been placed in an honorable position in schools. It is one of the chief features of experimental science, that she is rich in men of moderate talent, who are sound without being brilliant, and true without being profound. Her advance, indeed, is in large measure brought about by the united labors of men of this stamp, who, having been thoroughly trained and brought into obedience through their own original studies and inquiries, would readily furnish from their ranks a band of energetic and admirable teachers.

"It keeps it in mind."—It would be hard for most people to give a better reason than this for attending on the social means of grace. A clergyman, writing for the American Messenger, says: Several little girls were in my study, seeking counsel to aid them in becoming Christians. One of them, a dear child not much more than eleven years old, said: "I haven't been to two or three of the meetings lately." Desiring to test her I answered: "It don't make us Christians to attend meetings, Lizzie." "I know that," she replied at once, "but it keeps it in mind."

Is there not much wisdom in the child's answer? "It keeps it in mind." We suffer a slight excuse to detain us from the house of God on the Sabbath day. Do we have as much in mind at our home the thought of God as the one whom we should worship? Are we reminded as much of the great facts of our immortality and responsibility, remaining away from the sanctuary, as if we had gone there? And if we continue in such a course for weeks, or months, or even years, is there not danger that we shall forget almost entirely that there is such a being as the Almighty God?

It is a rule of the Prussian Board of Trade that every fifth wheel in a railway-train must have a brake.

REV. ALEXANDER SALE.

BY R. H. RIVERS.

It was about the year 1833 that I became acquainted with the great and good man whose name stands at the head of this article. He was then a Trustee of La Grange College, and I was a student. I can remember distinctly with what awe I looked upon that Board. The Rev. Turner Saunders, a most dignified and polished Christian gentleman, was the presiding officer. His hair approached to snow-whiteness. It was certainly the whitest I have ever seen adorning the head of old age. The Rev. Robert Paine, then in his prime, was the President of the College, and also a member of the Board. James E. Saunders, mild and gentle in his manners, pleasant in his spirit, a statesman and a scholar, was also of them. There, too, was Major Robert Ferver, nearly as large as the famous Senator Dixon H. Lewis, and as massive in mind as in body. He wielded a facile and graceful pen, and read with a grace, dignity, beauty, and elegance which I have never known surpassed.

Not the least conspicuous among these men was the Rev. Alexander Sale. He was then about fifty years of age. He wore his grizzled hair long and combed back over his shoulders. He was tall and erect as an Indian chief. His complexion was dark, his eyes black, and his features exhibited a character at once solid and firm. It is no small compliment to him to say that among the men who then controlled the destinies of La Grange College, Alexander Sale stood as high as the highest for sound, sober, and liberal views, for wise counsels, and for energetic and benevolent action. His words were ever those which the soundest discretion dictated, and which the most prudent regarded as perfectly safe to follow. His mind moved slowly; he approached his subjects with great caution. He advanced in his propositions with the greatest deliberation. He never reached his conclusions until he felt assured of having arrived at the truth. He seldom arose to very high or grand outbursts of eloquence, but he always wielded the eloquence of truth, of sincerity, and of incorruptible integrity of character.

He was a man of the clearest intellect, of the purest principles, of the firmest will, and of the deepest piety. Slow in taking a position, he was almost immovable after such position was taken. His command of language was limited, and his imagination was not vivid. His feelings were strong; they were slow in their movements. He seldom wept, but when the great depth of his feelings was probed, and their fountains broken up, he moved like a tornado; he was then overpowering. People looked up and wondered; the aged were appalled; the young were filled with awe. His own strong feelings were permeating the audience; the victory was his; the triumph complete. At such times he appeared like a victorious commander. He looked a conqueror; he appeared as if his whole soul were glowing upon his hard, brown features, flashing from his eye, now lighted up with unearthly luster—you felt that you were in the presence of a giant, and that you were a pigmy in his hands.

Father Sale, in his youth and early manhood, was a member of the Virginia Conference. He was then the companion and friend of Douglass, and Early, and Hezekiah Leigh. Nearly fifty years ago he came out West, and settled near Courtland, Ala. He was for a brief period itinerant and presided over nearly one half of the State of Alabama, which did not then constitute more than two presiding elders' districts. His fine administrative ability admirably fitted him to be a Presiding Elder. He held the reigns of government with a firm and steady hand. He counseled the young men with consummate wisdom, and managed the affairs of the Church with distinguished success.

His home in the beautiful valley of the Tennessee was the model of intelligence, order, refinement, and piety. His daughters grew up to be amongst the most elegant, pure-minded and pious Southern women. One of them, "polished after the similitude of a palace," amiable, beautiful, and pious, became in 1853 the happy wife of the Rev. Linus Parker, of New Orleans. After a few happy weeks of married life, she fell a victim to yellow fever, which prevailed so fearfully during that memorable year. The rare virtues of a pure and noble wife, who had qualities that would have adorned a queen, added to his own stern integrity, practical sense, and unquestioned moral excellence, were of themselves sufficient to develop the highest human excellences in their children. In addition to these precious influences they had the association of the very best Southern society. His eldest son is the Hon. J. B. Sale, of Aberdeen, Miss. He is a gentleman of great moral and intellectual worth, a distinguished lawyer, and an humble Christian.

In his personal appearance he much resembles his father. Of his youngest son Melville I have lost sight since the war.

Alexander Sale was not a brilliant man; but he was a very wise one. He seldom made a mistake in practical life. He seldom had to mourn over foolish blunders. He had a genial companion, interesting and instructive in conversation, given to hospitality, and though plain, was always pleasant in his manners. He was dignified, without being repulsive, and pious without moroseness. He commanded respect without exciting awe, and attracted friendship without too great familiarity. He was wise without being learned, and he was great without being vain. For more than thirty years he was a great power in the Tennessee Valley; the young looked up to him as a friend and a father, while the man of middle age gladly received his counsel, and the aged rejoiced in his society.

His faith in God was calm, strong, and assuring. This was often manifested, when others doubted. Once at a camp-meeting, many efforts had been made to bring sinners in penitence to the altar. They had all been abortive. Not one penitent had asked the prayers of the Church. Father Sale arose calmly in the rude pulpit; he required the altar to be cleared; he asked that another bench be added to those already in the altar, that the large number of seekers of religion might be accommodated. All were astonished; the question was universal: "What does the preacher mean?" The altar being arranged to his liking, he expressed his belief that the Holy Ghost would be poured out upon the people. For a time all was suspense; but he never faltered; he approached the sinner through his reason and his conscience; he advanced slowly; he broke down upon prejudice; he overcame opposition; he arose to the height of his great argument. He swayed the vast audience at his will; tears flowed, bosoms heaved, sobs were heard, hearts were pierced, and the altar was crowded with penitents. For years after this the preachers would speak of this effort as exhibiting a power both with God and man, and as illustrating an assuring faith, surpassing anything they had ever witnessed. He appeared to us to be too confident. A failure we thought would have been ruin; but he had no fear of failure, for he knew in whom he trusted.

In his old age, long after he was three-score and ten-years old, he determined to leave his beautiful home in the Courtland Valley. He did so; the war came on; he went to Louisiana. Of this last sickness and death we have no special account. He died right; of that we are sure, for he had been a true and faithful servant of God for more than a half century. Such is the estimate of this man of God by one who knew him well, and took sweet counsel from him for more than twenty-five years.

From Good Words.

RAISINS.

BY JOHN H. JACKSON.

The numerous varieties of grapes which produce the various wines of commerce are the effects simply of different degrees of climate and soil. Thus we find that different districts produce fruit more or less valued for the abundance or richness of their juice. The smaller berries are generally the most esteemed for this purpose. In some districts, however, the produce is quite unfit for making wine, and the fruits are then dried and form the raisins of our shops. All raisins, then, whether they be Muscates, Valencias, or whatever variety, are in reality true grapes, differing from the wine grapes only in size, or the absence of the juicy principle which to a considerable extent develops into flesh or pulp. The best raisins are grown on the Spanish shores of the Mediterranean, the climate about Valencia and Malaga apparently suiting them better than anywhere else. But raisins are also extensively cultivated in the lower parts of Greece, as well as in other parts of the continent.

The Muscatel is the finest kind of raisin imported. The preparation or drying, upon which the value of the fruit to a great extent depends, is in its case conducted differently from that of the more common kinds. Usually the grapes are gathered in bunches when fully ripe, and hung up or spread out to dry. These are afterwards placed in vessels full of holes, and dipped in ley made of wood ashes and vanilla, with the addition of a little salt and oil. This brings the saccharine juice to the surface, and causes the dark brown color as well as the crystallization of sugar which is so characteristic of the cheaper fruit. The best varieties are simply dried in the sun before removal from the tree. The fruit is carefully watched, and when at the proper stage of ripeness the stalks of the bunches are partly cut through and allowed to hang till dry, the fruit by this means retaining its bloom, and being a light color when dry. Amongst the many varieties of raisins, known in commerce are Valencias, Denias, and Lexias from Spain, and Malagas from Malaga in Granada. All these varieties of fruit are imported into this country in what are commercially called boxes and half boxes of half a hundredweight and a quarter of a hundredweight gross.

The small light-colored raisins known as Sultanias we receive from Smyrna, and as everybody knows these are devoid of "stones," or more properly seeds. This seedless form has been brought about by a higher state of cultivation and usually fetches a higher price in the market. A common cheap fruit is also imported from Smyrna, quite the reverse of the little Sultanias, being of a very dark color, and having very large seeds.

The little black fruits which in a culinary sense are of so much value, and which common usage and the corruption of a word has taught us to call Currants, are likewise a seedless variety of grape. The word currant is derived from Corinth, which was originally the principal place of its cultivation. If the ancient Corinth no longer supplies us with the bulk of this most useful fruit, the whole of our imports are still brought from the numerous islands of the Archipelago and the neighboring shores of Asia Minor.

As regards age, it may be said that a vine, like the oak, remains sound for centuries. Pliny, indeed, speaks of a vine of the age of 600 years; and there are proofs of whole vineyards in Italy and France that produce abundance of fruit now, having performed like duties three or four centuries ago. At the close of the last century there was an old vine at Northlerton, in Yorkshire, the stem of which measured about fifteen inches in diameter, and which was then about 100 years old. But vines have even been known to produce trunks large enough for sawing up into planks, and working into articles of furniture, for which purpose the wood is well adapted, as it is very tough. The vine in this country does not, of course, grow to so large a size as abroad, and we should look in vain for such a monster as that which Strabo mentions, and of which he states that two men with outstretched arms could not encircle its stem.

Of all the products of the vine, wine, as we have before said, is the most important. Next in importance are grapes in the dried state—namely, raisins and currants; and lastly, grapes, properly so called—undried, or fresh grapes. The quantities imported of these are not very great; what are seen in our shops are chiefly known as Portugal and Hambro grapes, the latter being grown on the Rhine and brought here via Hamburg. They come in neat round baskets, each containing twelve pounds of fruit; and from Portugal in jars, packed in sawdust.

Thus we have seen how varied are the products of one plant.—The common grape vine is but one example out of many of the value and importance of man's art and genius in working upon God's created works, and by cultivation producing both variety and beauty. Creation of a distinct form is alone the work of an Almighty power; but it is to man's honor as well as to God's glory, that the great works of Nature should be developed and diversified to meet the requirements of those whom God has placed upon the earth to till it, and to enjoy the fruits thereof.

The thin tubes used by artists to hold liquid colors are formed by placing a disk of block tin in a die or cylinder, into which a punch is slowly forced by hydraulic pressure or other suitable means. The punch almost exactly fits the cylinder, and the tin rises into the intervening annulus in the same way as if it were a liquid, its constituent particles being made to move on each other in much the same way as they would do if the tin were melted by heat.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.—When the Preacher receives the name of a subscriber, he should receive the money with it, and a three cent stamp, for the purpose of sending both name and money at the same time in the same letter. Suppose the letter never arrives—the loss is ours; and the subscriber receives his paper. We hope that our agents and subscribers will see the force of these views—we feel them.

TWO THOUSAND.

We hope to obtain two thousand new Subscribers this January. If our brethren, the Preachers, will secure us FOUR A PIECE, that will yield the two thousand. We greatly prefer that subscribers should start with the year and they prefer it too. Now many wish us well who do not wish us to the amount of four new subscribers. There are hundreds of our people who would take the paper if asked; and hundreds who are not of our church, who would as soon subscribe to this ADVOCATE as to any family paper, if one could be found to solicit them. We hope that our agents will sustain the New Orleans CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, as the French Creoles shingle houses. We have seen as many as four-teen on one small roof.

ADVERTISING.

The week after an advertisement appears in this paper it is moving along all the highways in the Mobile, the Montgomery, the Louisiana, and the Mississippi Conferences, in the pocket of the Preacher. He reads it riding along on horseback—that is if it be large enough to attract his eye, and sprightly, withal. He believes it—that is as much of it as is really true. Then at night he tells it all over to the best set of listeners in the world. Men of enterprise and thought should "think on these things."

Southwestern Bible Society.

At the regular annual election for officers of the Southwestern Bible Society the following named gentlemen were elected:

President.—J. H. Maybin, Esq.
Vice Presidents.—Thomas Sloo, Esq., S. B. Newman, Esq., Thomas J. Allen, M.D., of Shreveport, T. K. Price, Esq.

Board of Directors.—P. H. Skipwith, Esq., H. V. Ogden, Esq., T. J. Dix, Esq., J. S. Copes, M.D., James N. Beadles, Esq., W. M. Perkins, Esq.

MUSICAL.—If there was a little bell so attached to the hearts of men as to ring every time one did what was wrong, this would be a musical world.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

LAY REPRESENTATION.

The Lay Delegates to the Conference were not present "in force" as military men would say, only enough of them to constitute a Lay reconnaissance. But those who were present were effective and did most excellent service as members and on Committees. We give below the names of the gentlemen who were elected to this important post in the service of the Church.

NEW ORLEANS DISTRICT.—Dr. B. H. Moss, Wm. H. Dameron, J. O. Fagua, Esq., and Rev. J. C. Miller.

SHREVEPORT DISTRICT.—Rev. C. B. Stuart, Dr. J. R. W. Williams, Judge Joseph M. Ford, Stephen D. Chapman.

Alternates: Rev. J. Sterling Lane, J. L. Scales, John Holmes.

MONROE DISTRICT.—James A. Pugh, T. C. Standifer, Mr. Patton. Alternate, Col. R. B. Todd.

OPELOUSAS DISTRICT.—Col. A. W. Bryant, Dr. W. E. Walker, J. B. Price, and Dr. J. W. Cherish.

ALEXANDRIA DISTRICT.—Dr. T. S. Collier.

HOMER DISTRICT.—W. F. Moreland, John Wilson, A. Riser, Rev. Mr. Love.

THE MEMBERSHIP.

The reports from several of the Districts are so defective that there can be made only an approximation to a comparative statistical view of the result of the year's labor. The gain on the New Orleans District is 280 white. The gain on the Bastrop, Minden and Homer Districts, is 84 whites and 161 blacks. There has been a gain of 40 in the Shreveport District; a gain of 270 appears on the Opelousas District. A loss of 152 whites and 95 blacks on the Tensas District. The Alexandria District shows a loss of blacks. These two last named Districts have been under water during the past year, and hundreds of families have removed from them. The sum total of the membership in the circuits and stations of the Conference for 1867, as we make it out from very imperfect data, are 7883 whites, 1449 blacks. This is a total increase of 39 whites, and decrease of 529 blacks. Louisiana is in the vortex of all the troubles, commercial, financial, political, and social. Our people are moving from one point to another in the State, from the country to the city, and from the towns into the country; many are leaving the fertile valleys and lowlands which may no longer be protected against the Spring floods of the Mississippi. They are going to Texas, to Tennessee, to Alabama, to Honduras, any where, to escape the disasters which prostrate equally town and country. This is descriptive, we doubt not, of other parts of the South, but in no other part of it is there anything like the same wreck of wealth and breaking up of population. We are only surprised that the membership of the churches does not show a greater falling off. The Northern part of the work has been blessed with gracious revivals during the past fall, and many have been added to the church in all parts of the Conference territory, but the extraordinary wastes of the membership have been great.

The Methodist Traveling Preacher who labors in Louisiana earns his bread—certainly all that he gets. He always has earned it, even in the palmy days of the past, but the work as at present, requires a sinew of faith only less than Damascus steel, and the spirit of endurance as strong as a Roman shield. These men of God have been cured by a slow fire, and have an exceeding firm muscle. They are as cheerful as princes—the "outward man" perishes, but the "inward man" is renewed day by day. We do not wonder that they die as Apostles, for they live as heroes. Those dreary swamps, and long rides, and cheerless stopping places, and thinly settled, half Catholic, half French regions not only try the faith of an itinerant, but do greatly strengthen it.

ARCHBISHOP WHATELY, describing common place preachers, said: "In their sermons, they aim at nothing, and hit."

CHRISTMAS AND THE CHILDREN.

Without the children Christmas season would be a comparatively quiet one; but the stir they make among the toy-shops, in the streets, about the house, and all over the yard on this day is something bewildering to one contemplatively disposed. Those Chinese fire-crackers are a good deal for a little. They cost about seven cents a pack—we have often wished that it was seventy. How the Chinese manage to get them up so cheaply we never could guess; and there are so many of them in a pack! A small boy feels himself multiplied into three times his own size at every explosion of these "Celestial" fire-works; and it is surprising to see with what vigor and for what length of time he can keep up the bombardment. We have come to feel thankful for the eyes of all our young friends at the close of every Christmas. What ever suggested such an expression for the delight felt upon the return of this holy day, it would take a Chinese philosopher to imagine. We do not mention these things in the hope of any change, but merely to record a wonder that is, we fear, destined to increase annually.

There is a much more legitimate department of Christmas in which the young people take great interest. The amount of confectionery, gingerbread, sweet meats, and puddings consumed on that day over and above the more ordinary diet of turkeys, roast pigs, beef, mutton, chickens, or of deer, rabbits, and other game is sufficient to impress a heathen with the notion that with Christians much joy and much food always go together. There is we believe an ancient and a scriptural union between feast-days and holy-days. When David brought the Ark from the house of Obed-edom to Zion, "He dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine." Our people therefore need have no hesitation in joining the children in this part of Christmas, and so far as we have observed they already are thoroughly orthodox.

Heretofore in this Southern land there has been so great an abundance of food that a family must be poor indeed that could not afford a "good piece of flesh" as a part of the pleasure of the day; but we fear that many on last Wednesday, for the first time in their lives, were denied that luxury of the season. It used to be a custom to send a poor neighbor enough to make him and his children full and happy on that day, so as to sweeten one's own dinner; and that will be a sad time indeed when such godly remembrance of others ceases. We believe that those who have not much get a more hearty satisfaction out of what they have, upon these days which Providence has provided for human cheer, than those who abound in good things. God has ordered a just compensation for every condition in life.

But there is a church side as well as a social side to this venerable festival. It has long been customary on this day of joy to fill the house of God with evergreens, flowers, and little children; and to swell the sounding Anthems to the Saviour, with their sweet carols, and so prevent the stones. This is indeed the Christian side of this holy day, and will become more and more its characteristic as the world becomes better. We have spent delightful hours during this last Christmas-eve and Christmas night with the children of the Church. At CARONDEL STREET, we forgot for one short hour in its bright array of youth, in the sweetness of its music, and the generous fullness of its Christmas tree, the whole world's poverty and sin. The exercises were prefaced with a neat and appropriate address to the children by Mr. Carlyle. The teachers and scholars made a clean breast of all their Christmas feelings in one grand continuous outburst of happy speeches and ringing songs.

This tide of hopeful innocence and youth flowed in full enough to float off many a stranded heart; and under the blessed influence and example of those who are too young to know anything else but to trust and be happy, the aged and careworn once more gained the open deep water of grateful repose. Our proper relation to God is beautifully illustrated in the helplessness and simplicity of childhood, which without anxiety confides in those that love. We must receive the kingdom of Heaven as a little child because God has declared himself to be 'our Father' in Heaven. And the church that nurses its children and youth, most becomes soonest moulded and established in the gentleness and faith of Christ.

On the same evening, the MOREAU STREET School was all ablaze with Christmas. The choir was filled with people. The speaking was excellent—it generally is at that school. The beautiful story of Joseph was well rendered, and brought tears to many eyes not used to weep. The children at that end of the town have a friend who has stood by them for many years, and who still finds it his greatest pleasure to minister to their enjoyment. Heaven doubtless rewards him "in his deed."

On Christmas night the GERMAN CHURCH ON DRYADES STREET was full of beaming faces and snoring good things. Two great pyramids of cakes looked down upon the contending forces at their base much more inspiring than "forty centuries" could have done. One feature of the evening was the admirable singing of the Sabbath-School. These German children begin to learn music about the time that American children are being weaned. They know not only songs but the art of singing. We were much interested in a bunch of boys, every one note book in hand, upon whom devolved the heavy bass. They acquitted themselves manfully. Much credit is due to the Superintendent, J. H. Keller, for the way in which he has trained this youthful brigade—and handles it. The greatest attraction however was a new melodrama, a Christmas gift to the school. It was well played by Miss Caroline Trostlick. And now, in conclusion, it is a sad sight to see those boys who, alas! have been straggling from school for months now coming up, while these Christmas trees and skies are dropping manna, trying to "make the connection." Poor fellows, they are left in outer cold, and seem to repent the folly of neglecting a golden opportunity. They now feel the melancholy truth that, Christmas comes but once a year, and that is a long time for one to wait before he can mend the errors of the past.

THE HIGH SCHOOLS.

We had the pleasure, in company with a vast audience, of witnessing the exercises attending the graduation of three senior classes of the three departments of the City High School. The whole scene was radiant with youthful faces, and well dressed people. The first thought of satisfaction which came up to our mind was upon the discovery that we were all white. Not a single cloud, nor so far as we could discover the slightest relic of the "peculiar institution" rested upon the fair assemblage. It has been a long time since we have had so complete an exemption from that universal and inevitable disturbing force. We meet it in the cars, in the city council, in the convention, in the courts, and, but for the firm resistance of our noble School Board, we should have met it, and maybe nothing but it in the common schools. Fortunately these gentlemen by the aid of the little law that remains, were enabled to segregate the African element to itself.

The audience was delightfully entertained until a late hour with speeches, compositions, and music. The young gentlemen acquitted themselves well. Their manner of speaking was unpretending and natural, and evidenced much training. The treatment of the subjects discussed was not so mature as to deprive it of its claim to originality. The young ladies read distinctly, both in the English and French languages, compositions which were highly creditable to their good sense and scholarship. Only those of the graduates took part upon the platform who have stood highest in their studies during the past four years. We noticed that the general average of the age of those in the graduating class was some two years older than that of graduates before the War. This is a very important change for the better. There always has been a tendency with us in the South, to put our children through a High School or College course, without reference to the immaturity of their powers. In this way a large part of the time and money spent upon them was worse than wasted.

The music of the evening was under the able and tasteful direction of Mr. La Hache. The President of the Board, Mr. W. S. Monnt, in a felicitous speech to the graduating classes, gave some valuable statistics and facts in regard to the history of these schools from their origin down to the proconsulship of Major General Benjamin Franklin Butler. Nothing can so well inform the general reader of the great work which these public schools of this city are effecting as a statement of some of these items, which we append.

"One word about finances and I have done. Last year the Common Council appropriated 360,000 dollars for the white schools, and 70,000 for the organization of the colored schools—making, in all, 430,000 dollars.

Of the 360,000, the whole expenditure for the white schools amounts to 339,000 dollars; and for the colored, since the 13th October, when the first school was opened, 16,000 dollars—making in all, 355,000 dollars. The schools, are the only branch of public service which has not exceeded the appropriation made, it will be perceived at a glance that the white schools, by a rigid economy, have saved out of 360,000 the sum of 21,000—which with an amount saved by the Fourth District before the war, $5500, deposited with the treasurer now in office, makes $25,500 which properly should be to the credit of public schools on the books of the city, together with $70,000 appropriated for colored schools, less $16,000 spent—leaves an additional credit of $54,000. Making in all $39,500.

The public schools will require for the year 1868, by a careful estimate, the sum of $396,900, exclusive of new school houses and extensive repairs needed on the buildings now needed. When I see, therefore, the Board of Assistant Aldermen have put in the budget the sum of $240,000 only, I am driven to the conclusion that political acerbity and not wisdom governs these gentlemen of the lower board. I hope for better things from the gentlemen of the upper board. They must take into consideration that $140,000 to 150,000 is derived from a State tax, independently."

We add, for information, that the average daily roll of children in attendance is about 13,000 white, and 2,000 black. The President during his address paid a deserved tribute to the person who first set in motion this great public charity.

Before leaving this part of my subject, let me pay a just tribute to the man who laid the foundation of this magnificent superstructure, the public schools of New Orleans. He now lies speechless upon a bed of affliction, the sands of life fast ebbing away. To Edward Yorke it eminently belongs—a monument more enduring than brass, more glorious than any erected to an Alexander or a Napoleon. Let his name, therefore, be revered by every lover of education, and enshrined in the memory of every public school scholar."

MOBILE CONFERENCE.—We publish a short letter from the Rev. G. Shaeffer, of this Conference, in our columns. A note from Dr. Hamilton states the increase of membership for the past year to be some 1200 whites, and a loss of blacks.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.—We refer our readers to the letter from the Rev. F. A. Mood, for information from the recent session of this Conference.

MOBILE CONFERENCE.

Columns, Miss., December 19, 1867.

MR. EDITOR: I have just returned from the Mobile Annual Conference, at Marion, Perry county, Ala. We had a full attendance of the preachers, and quite a number of lay delegates. There were more than a usual number of our aged men, and they almost appeared to renew their youth in associating with their younger brethren. It was pleasant to witness the marked respect shown to them by the younger ministers. "This is peculiarly gratifying to the old men, who are easily tempted to regard themselves as useless lumber, and rather in the way. The business was conducted with great harmony and dispatch under the presidency of Bishop Wightman, who is a most admirable presiding officer. The session closed on Monday night with the reading of the appointments. We had several excellent sermons during the session, and I trust a favorable impression was made. The presence of our highly venerated Bishop Andrew was very gratifying to the Conference. He was able to preach on the Sabbath, and frequently occupied the chair, and gave the preachers occasionally some excellent advice, drawn from his long experience in the ministry. He looked well, but evidently begins to feel the weight of years.

I was much pleased with the representatives. Several of them were quite prominent men. They appeared to be quite pious and unassuming, and their practical common sense views of the subjects which they spoke were highly profitable. We found their business talents of great service on the committees. We had the usual amount of speech-making, though the Bishop tried to keep down a great redundancy. In all annual conferences, I presume, there are some members who do not think any question properly disposed of without their aid, and we are not an exception to the rule; but in the main we are very much given to "spouting." I have sometimes been amused to see the anxiety which some manifest to get more than their legitimate share of the talking. After a subject has been thoroughly discussed, and the chair is ready to put the question, and the Conference anxious to have it disposed of, a brother will rise and say, "Mr. President, I don't wish to detain the Conference, but I wish to say one word." The Bishop courteously replies: "Well, sir, one word," and branches off into a five or six minutes' speech, or he will say, "I do not want to make a speech, but ask a question," and in asking the question he will manage to make a pretty long speech, after having spoken twice or thrice before. The patience of the Bishop and Conference is frequently put to the test by wordy speech-makers, who seem to think the Conference and the audience will appreciate their talents and influence unless they are heard on every subject. It is not much of a compliment to the sense and discernment of the Conference to throw such a redundancy of light on every subject, great and small. We were most hospitably entertained by the citizens of Marion. The Baptists, who are predominant there, were remarkably courteous, insisting on our occupying the body of their elegant church for our sessions. All the denominations opened their private houses and their churches for our service, and the preachers left with a high appreciation of the refinement and courtesy of the citizens. The preachers were all in fine spirits. Their pockets were light, but with the love of God in the hearts, and with strong faith in Providence, they went to their appointments cheerfully.

May God bless their labors abundantly the ensuing year, and make them angels of mercy thousands. G. SHAEFFER.

THE BERGEN-NITRO-GLYCERIN EXPLOSION.—The fact that another terrible accident has resulted from the careless handling of this explosive has been made known by the public press generally throughout the country; but the coroner's inquest, which is now being held on in Jersey City, has furnished us with a more reliable account of the disaster than the hastily written reports, and the manifest contradictions in the daily papers. It appears that in making a deep railway cutting, near South Bergen, the Central Railroad Company have been using glycerin, by reference, for powder. Late on the afternoon of the 25th ult., one of the employees who had charge of the blasting operations, entered the blacksmith's shop erected near the excavation, with a tin can containing about sixty pounds of glycerin, which had become partially melted. With the intention of pouring its contents, the can was placed in water, and the temperature of the latter was rapidly raised, changing into it red-hot bars of the glycerin. Exactly how the disaster was caused will never be known, as all persons in the vicinity miserably perished with it. It is probable, however, one of the men came into immediate contact with the can, imparting such a degree of heat to it as to cause explosion of its contents. Such a destructive force that no trace of the blacksmith's shop remained, its site being as clear as if building had been carefully removed away. The coroner's inquest thereupon, have not closed as yet, but from the testimony already given it would appear the lives of the eight victims were charged only upon the study of a drunken employee, who had his life as a penalty for his carelessness.—Scientific American.

OBITUARIES.

DIED. At his father's residence, Clear Lake Harbor, Florida, Sept. 29th, 1867, ALBES DAVIS, oldest son of the late Charles D. and Elizabeth Nicholson, Montgomery, Conference, of congenital of the brain, aged eight years, four months and seven days.

Charles, as he was familiarly known by those who knew him, was dutiful and affectionate to his parents, kind to and kind over his little brothers and sister, and punctual in the discharge of his duties, so much so that after he was sent to list his infant prayers, he was known to neglect or forget them being unwilling to rest.

He died at the same place, on the 14th day of November inst., of drooping heart, VIRGIL, youngest son of C. D. and Elizabeth Nicholson, aged years, two months and twenty-nine days.

But little Charles and Virgil are gone; their places around the family altar are vacant now. They sleep the sleep that knows no waking until "the voice of the angel and the Trump of God" shall come the sleeping dust of all the dead that sleep in Jesus. Then weep not, bereaved ones; they are not dead but asleep. Their harps are in their hands, and the "glory beams around their spirits."

DIED. In De Soto, Clarke Co., Miss., 13th, of congestion, GEO. COLEMAN SMITH, son of George and Virginia Smith, and grandson of Sydney E. Smith, aged about four years.

DIED. December 14th, 1867, in Monroeville, Ala., EDWARD RICHMOND, son of Rev. W. B. and Maggie Dennis, aged one year, two months, and six days.

Mrs. JANE M. DIVINE, consort of Ebenezer F. Divine, of Sharon, Miss., was born July 7th, 1820, in Madison County, Ala., removed to Mississippi with her father, Mr. Ford, in 1844 or 45, was married to E. F. Divine, in the city of Vicksburg, May 9th, 1850, and died of pulmonary consumption, after an illness of five years, Oct. 13th, 1867, in perfect peace. She was converted, and joined the M. E. Church, in 1837. Thus commencing the service of God in early life, and endeavoring to walk in the footsteps of pious parents, she was the better prepared in after years to bare the trials and afflictions through which she was called to pass. She was a kind wife, and a devoted mother. Her children received more than an ordinary amount of a mother's love and tender care; they were always ready for the Sunday-School room and church. She was a constant reader of the Bible and religious books. Her closet companion was read with great pleasure. On being asked, the evening before her death, with regard to her spiritual condition, she replied that her trust was in God. She suffered much, but her sufferings were borne with Christian resignation. Her "house" was set in order. She has gone to realize "that the sufferings of this present time are not to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." She had prayed that she might die easy, and she died like one falling asleep.

We mingle our sympathies and prayers with the bereaved family and friends. "But we sorrow not as those who have no hope." She suffers no more.

N. B. YOUNG.

The following Preamble and Resolutions were adopted unanimously by the Fayette Female Mission Association, of Fayette Circuit, Mississippi Conference, at a regular meeting held November 5th, 1867:

WHEREAS, It has pleased an All-wise Providence to remove from our midst our beloved sister, MARGARET A. O'QUIN:

Resolved, Be it resolved—1st. That we recognize in our deceased sister the sincere Christian and efficient co-laborer with us in this Association.

Resolved, That we sympathize with the husband, children, and friends of our departed sister, and would recommend them faithfully to follow her, as she followed her Redeemer, that they may meet hereafter, to part no more.

MELISSA M. COFFEY, Sec'y.

DIED. on the 7th inst., at Brunsville, Ala., after a short illness, WILHELM, only son of J. L. and Martha R. Murphy, in the 15th year of his age.

Copy of resolutions adopted by a rising vote of the Sabbath-School at Columbiana:

WHEREAS, In the Providence of God we are called to mourn the early death of our dear friend and school-mate, Wilcher Murphy;

Resolved, 1st. That while we lament his loss to our Sabbath-School and social circle, we feel resigned to God's will; and recognize this dispensation of His Providence as an admonition to us—"be ye also ready."

Resolved, 2d. That we will try, by a life of obedience to the commandments of God, to meet him in the Paradise above.

Resolved, 3d. That we tender to the bereaved parents and sister of the deceased our kindest sympathies; and trust that the grace of God will sustain them in their severe trial.

William Mason & E. S. Hoadly's New Method for the Pianoforte.
Already a second edition of this new work is ready and nearly sold in advance. It is new in method and matter, embracing modern exercises and expedients not heretofore presented, while its selection of Exercises, Recitations, and Pieces, mostly from composers of recognized eminence, is unusually large and very choice. This is the first instruction book to include the technical of modern pianoforte playing. It has a full elucidation and illustration of Mr. Mason's new system of Accented Treatment of Exercises, by which the attention of the pupil is almost compelled, and careless practice is rendered nearly impossible, while not only the hands, but also the mind, taste, and artistic perceptions are cultivated and trained. It is eminently a practical work, the result of long and most successful experience in the natural highness of pianoforte teaching. It is carefully progressive, very clear and perspicuous, and full in its explanations and directions, illustrated by cuts and diagrams, and is adapted to the use of young beginners as well as of those who have made progress. 240 pp large 4to. Price $4. Two editions are published; one with American and one with European Fingering. Care should be taken to designate which is wanted. Published by

PROSPECTUS FOR 1868
OF
THE NEW YORK LEDGER, THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER.
All the Greatest Writers Write For It.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

The reason that the NEW YORK LEDGER has the largest circulation is, that it is the most "valuable." Why should it not have the largest circulation? More labor, more talent, more money, are bestowed upon it than upon any other paper. Its moral tone is always pure and elevated. The leading Clergymen of the United States, the Presidents of the principal Colleges, the greatest Poets, Wits and Statesmen of the country, are among the contributors to its columns. The reader always gets more than his money's worth in the Ledger. We have always had the best writers, and always shall have them, cost what it may. Whatever we have promised in our verities heretofore, our readers will bear witness that we have always performed: and not only that, but a great deal more. For instance, in our last Prospectus, we announced a story by Henry Ward Beecher, which we gave; but we did not announce Horace Greeley's Autobiography, which we are now publishing; nor did we announce the series of articles entitled "Advice to Young Men," by the Twelve College Presidents. The rule on which the LEDGER is conducted is to get the best of everything. Whether it has been promised or not. The publisher recognizes this fact; and it is from their desire to obtain the very best paper that they give the Ledgers the preference; hence its unparalleled and unapproached circulation, being over three hundred thousand copies.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Now, for the new year: All our present corps of popular authors will continue to write for the LEDGER: we shall begin the new year with a new story by Mrs. Southworth; the Honorable Horace Greeley will continue his Autobiography; Fanny Fern her sparkling sketches; John Jr., his entertaining stories; Hyman Cohh, Beecher his original papers; James Parton his last dramatic sketches; Miss Dundy her Narrative; Mary Kyle Dallas, her Dramatic Sketches; Conrad, Mrs. Vaughan, Bryant, Alice Cary, Dr. Charles D. Gardner, Geo. D. Prentiss, Nathan D. Urner, Emma Alice Brown, Mrs. Schmitt, Wm. Ross Wallace, their

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

THE LITTLE ARM-CHAIR.

An old man sat in an old arm-chair,
When in there came, with boisterous joy, His great-grandchild, a little boy,
With a small arm-chair he had found somewhere In an old out-house, up an old stair;
And he sat down by the old man there.

It had been his own in early years,
And thoughts came crowding everywhere;
From the dingy wood of that haunted chair,
And the old man's eyes ran down with tears,
As he read that pictured book o'er,
Which gave him back the days of yore.

In turn, his brothers and sisters, ten,
Had claimed and called that chair their own;
And there each sat on his little throne—A little race of great small men—Like kings elsewhere, for a little space, Till a rival came and took his place.

And another sat, with toy and shent, His own six sons and daughters sweet, Had kept possession of that seat, Till the chair itself had thrust them out,
As thrusts its teeming tenants forth, The old ancestral arm-chair, earth—All having one, a daughter fair, Who breathed her last in that loved arm-chair.

And then the chair it was put away,
And time rolled on, and, one by one,
A daughter now, and then a son, Went out into the world's highway,
And after many years had gone,
The old, old man was left alone.

Care by that boy, whose mother dear His widow's sorrow wearily bore, And watched his second childhood o'er,
And strove his drooping heart to cheer,
And there in tears, in his old arm-chair,
The old man sat with his hoary hair,
And wrinkled front and temples bare,
And gazed and wept on that small arm-chair Which his great-grandchild had put down there.

The Piping Bull-Finch.

"I am now going to tell you about a school for birds."

"A school for birds? How odd I never heard of such a school!"

"And yet such a school there is, and very good scholars it makes.
They can not read or write, but they can sing."

"I would like to see birds at school.
Tell me of it. Do they not sing without being taught?"

"They sing a few simple notes, like the small finches you may hear in the fields; but, after they are taught, they will whistle regular tunes."

"Last Summer I was at a friend's house at Nahant. I rose early in the morning, and went down stairs to walk on the piazza. While there I heard, as I thought, some person whistling a tune in a very sweet style."

"I looked around, but could see no one. Where could the sound come from? I looked up, and saw a little bird in a cage. The cage was hung in the midst of flowers and twining plants."

"Can it be, thought I, that such a little bird as that has been taught to sing a regular tune so sweetly?
I did not know what to make of it!"

"When my friend came down stairs, she told me that it was indeed the little bird who had whistled the sweet tune."

"Then my friend cried out to the bird, 'Come, Bully, sweet little Bully Bull-finch, give us just one more tune.'"

"And then this dear little bird hopped about its cage, looked at its mistress, and whistled another sweet tune. It was so strange to hear a bird whistle a regular tune!"

"Now, Bully, said my friend, you must give us 'Yankee Doodle.' Come, come, you shall have some nice fresh seed if you will whistle 'Yankee Doodle.' And the little thing did whistle it, much to my surprise."

"My friend then told me that she had brought the bird from the little town of Fulda, in Germany. In Fulda there are little schools for teaching these birds to sing."

"When a bull-finch has learnt to sing two or three tunes, he is worth from forty to sixty dollars; for he will bring that price in France or England."

"Great skill and patience are needed to teach these birds. Few teachers can have the time to give to the little children under their charge so much care as these bird-teachers give to their pupils."

"The birds are put in classes of about six each, and kept for a time in a dark room. Here, when their food is given to them, they are made to hear music; so that when they want more food, they will sing, and try to imitate the tune they have just heard. This tune they probably connect with the act of feeding."

"As soon as they begin to imitate a few notes, the light is let into the room; and this cheers them still more, and makes them feel as if they would like to sing."

"In some of these schools the birds are not allowed either light or food till they begin to sing. These are the schools where the teachers are most strict."

"After being thus taught in classes, each bull-finch is put under the care of a boy, who plays his organ from morning till night, while the master or mistress of the bird-school goes round to see how the pupils are getting on.

"The bull-finches seem to know at once when they are scolded, and when they are praised by their master or mistress; and they like to be petted when they have done well."

"The training goes on for nine months; and then the birds have got their education, and are sent to England or France, and sometimes to America to be sold."

ADVICE TO THE STOKER'S WIFE.—A correspondent, signing himself "J.
G. Konvalinka," sympathizes with the sad but not altogether hopeless case of the stoker's wife, and requests us to publish the following paragraph of "advice gratis."

"Take some sweet oil, and with this thoroughly anoint that black fellow; then wipe off the greasy dirt by means of old newspapers or waste cotton; after this apply soap suds with a scrubbing brush, and polish him off with a coarse towel.
This bleaching process will make the stoker as white as snow in less than no time (?), although he may have been, as his worthy wife says, 'black as any crow'; and then he can enjoy the Sunday afternoon as behooves white folks. If sweet oil is too expensive for that purpose, linseed oil or any other cheap kind of oil will answer. In this manner any black dirt from the furnace, machine shop or burnishing room, as well as soot or tar, can easily be removed from the hands and face of the stoker—or 'any other man.'—American Artisan.

SOME time ago, when fitting a tire on a wheel at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, England, it was found necessary to give a level to the tire of about three-eighths of an inch.
One of the men suggested that the tire could be given by heating the tire red hot and then immersing it one-half its depth in cold water.
This was tried and found to answer perfectly, the part which was out of the water being reduced in diameter. The tire was three inches wide, one-half inch thick, and four feet two inches diameter.

THE SUEZ CANAL.—A tug belonging to the British government has actually been floated through the Suez canal. This was the Prompt, recently dispatched from England to assist in the embarkation of the Indian troops at Suez, and was conveyed through the new Suez canal to the Red Sea. After having been lightened as much as possible, even to the removal of the paddle-wheels, a number of empty casks were placed under her, and in this manner she reached Suez.

SULPHURET of carbon has the pre-eminence of being the most stinking material known, but it has long been of great use as a solvent of India rubber. Lately, however, it has been discovered that it is also one of the best solvents of the essential oils of flowers, and, as a consequence, it has suddenly sprung into favor as a most valuable agent in the production of perfumes and scents.

TO FIX PENCIL WRITING.—Pencil writing may be fixed almost indelibly as ink by passing the moistened tongue over it. Even breathing slowly over the lines after writing renders them much less liable to erasure than when not subjected to that process. A trial of the experiment will readily satisfy any person of the utility of the idea.—Boston Journal of Chemistry.

AUSTRIA has now seven iron-clads, the most formidable of which is the Lissa, which has just been built in the ship yard of M. Tonello, of Trieste. The Lissa has engines of 1,000 horse-power, protected by armor-plating six inches thick. She is 284 feet long, 55 feet wide, and carries eleven Krupp guns. An eight iron-clad, the Heligoland, is now being built at Pola.

TO PRESERVE PEGGED BOOTS AND SHOES.—If pegged boots are occasionally dressed with petroleum between the soles and the upper leather they will not rip. If the soles are dressed with petroleum they will resist wet and wear well. The pegs are not affected by dryness after being well oiled.

In England, this year, the supply of American cotton has been five per cent. beyond that of last year, while the quantity from India has experienced a reduction of twenty-nine per cent.

The first locomotive which crossed the Colorado river on the ninth of last month, at Columbus, Texas, over the new bridge, did so amid shouts and the roar of artillery.

IT APPEARS probable that Indian steel (wootz) owes its admirable qualities as a material for cutting instruments to the presence of a little aluminum.

The Prussian railway engineers have been among the first to lay rails without sleepers, planting them directly on the ballast, and it is said, with perfect success.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Stealing Grapes.

A Montreux (Switzerland) correspondent of an exchange tells about the manner in which Swiss vineyards are protected:

"Not a grape is allowed to be touched until a given time, when bans are published and every one begins at once. The rigor with which the first clause of this edict is enforced is sometimes a little inconvenient to strangers who do not thoroughly understand its bearings.

In passing along the road where the ripe clusters lean temptingly over the wall, or peep luringly through the low, accessible fence, it is the most natural thing in the world, although not altogether compatible with the strictest rules of honesty, to yield to that ancient impulse of our Mother Eve, and 'pluck and eat.' But woe for him who is thus beguiled! His written it shall turn to ashes on his lips. Scarcely has its tempting freshness touched his tongue when an apparition rises in his path—the inevitable, ubiquitous, presumptuous Swiss official, and the astonished culprit is led off in spite of argument to the rusty rusty village prison, who requires for this one fatal bunch of grapes and its accompanying sin, the extenuating sum of 40 francs. All explanation and protestation is in vain, and delinquent returns a wiser if not a better man. Students of kleptomania might find in the cases presented daily at this little office interesting subjects to illustrate this beautiful and charitable theory. Quiet elderly gentlemen in spectacles and white cravats, occupying highly responsible positions at home, pastors who have been sent abroad for their health by trusting congregations; highly conscientious and respectable maiden ladies, the dignity of whose manners, and sanctity of feature, attest the strict morality of their lives; and many others whose weakness in this respect had never been suspected by their dearest friends, offer a sad reflection on the general fallibility of human nature.
The penalty seems a stringent one; and yet I suppose without it the vineyards would be devastated by the swarms of people that inundate the country just before the vintage for the grape cure; and as grapes brought from the south of France in advance of the season are to be had at the little stalls at every turn of the road, there is no vindication for the transgressor."

From the American Agriculturist.
Indian Corn—Fertilization—How to Gain Two Ears to a Stalk.

A remarkable fact has lately been brought to our attention by Mr. H.
S. Bidwell, (Bidwell Bros.) of St.
Paul, who was recently traveling in Tennessee, where he saw a field of common corn, which usually yields an average of not more than one good ear to the stalk, bearing almost uniformly two and often three ears. The result, he informs us, had been brought about in this way.
It occurred to the farmer that, as the kernel usually derived its origin, as we have described, from two different plants, saving the seed corn from stalks bearing two ears was not enough; he must see to it that the kernel germs were fertilized by similar stalks. So he planted every year a special patch for seed, and carefully cut off all the spindles on stalks where two or more ears were not set. The result was an improvement year by year in the quantity of corn, as well as in the manner in which it grew. The principle has a wide application in the improvement of the different kinds of farm and garden produce. In the breeding of animals, the qualities expected from the male, and those which usually are inherited from the dam, are to a degree understood, and the application of similar principles in breeding vegetables is certainly legitimate. The fact above stated has so good a foundation in sound reasoning, that we give it to our readers, anticipating its publication in the "American Agricultural Annual," which is now in press.

WEEDS IN GRANARIES.—Some years since accident discovered to a French farmer a very simple and efficient method of preventing, or rather destroying, this insidious pest in corn and grain houses.
Happening to deposit, in one corner of a building in which there was stored a quantity of grain, a few sheep skins from which the wool had not been pulled, he found, upon examining them a few days after, that they were literally covered with weevils. The experiment was repeated, and always with the same result.

On stirring the corn (wheat probably) he was surprised to find that although previously infested to a degree that forbade all hope of saving it from immediate destruction by this pernicious foe, not a single insect was to be found among it.
The experiment is certainly worth trying. Instead of the sheep skins, which are quite valuable, we might substitute those of the woodchuck, which is increasing to an inconvenient and expensive extent. What killed the weevils, whether the fatty matter on the skin, or something else, we have not been able to learn.

At any rate let us try the woodchuck skins.

HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

RICE, BATTER CAKES.—Warm a quart of milk, and cut up in it a quarter of a pound of butter; when the butter is soft enough to be mixed with the milk, stir them well together, and add by degrees a cupful of sifted flour, and sufficient rice-flour to make a moderately thick batter. Beat two eggs very light, and stir them into the batter, and at last a teaspoonful of good yeast; cover it, and set it near the fire, rub it with a bit of butter tied in a nice white rag, and put on a ladle full of the batter for each cake, turning them carefully; bake them a light brown on both sides. As fast as they are baked lay them one over another, like buckwheat cakes, on a hot place, with several thin slices of butter over each, and when there are eight or ten in a pile, cut them across in quarters and send them immediately to the table. Or they may be made small, three or four on the griddle at once, and sent to be buttered there as fast as they are baked.

TO MAKE SOURKRAUT.—Take solid heads of cabbage, like the drumhead or saavy; cut it up a little coarser than for cold slaw; the quickest way is to put the heads into a tub and chop them with a clean sharp spade. Lay a few broad leaves of cabbage into a good, tight barrel, sprinkled over with a little salt, put in a layer six inches thick of the chopped cabbage, sprinkle with salt, and press it firmly down with a wooden pounder until the juice begins to show on the surface; then add another layer, and proceed in the same way until the barrel is quite full. Cover with leaves, fit the barrel head on closely, and lay on it a weight of 12 or 15 pounds. The cask must be perfectly tight, for if the salt leaks out the kraut will spoil. Three pints of salt to the barrel of cabbage is about the right proportion.

BAKED BEANS.—Pick over the beans the night before, and put them in warm water to soak where they will keep warm all night. Next morning pour off the water and add boiling water, and let them stand and simmer till the beans are soft; put in with them a nice piece of pork, the skin gashed. Put them in the deep dish in which they are to be baked, having just enough water to cover them. Hang the pork in the middle, so the top will be even with the surface. All the garden beans are better for baking than the common field-bean. They must bake in a moderately hot oven from two to three hours. This is a good wholesome dish, a great favorite with Northerners, but very nutritious and palatable in Delaware.

A PUM PLUM.—Three-quarters of a pound of raisins, stoned, three-quarters of a pound of suet, chopped fine, three-quarters of a pound of bread-crumbs, half a pound of brown sugar, one pound of currants, three tablespoonfuls of flour, six eggs, lemon-peel, cut fine, nutmegs, ginger, allspice, a little salt, and a glass of brandy. If it is too dry, add a little milk. It must be thick and well mixed. Orange citron, and a few sweet almonds may be added.
Three hours will boil it.

SPONGE CAKE.—Pour half a cupful of cold water over three-quarters of a pound of lump sugar. Let it dissolve, and then boil it. Break seven eggs, leaving out three of the whites. Be particular not to break the yolks. Then pour the boiling sugar over, and beat eleven minutes.
Stir in half a pound of flour and two or three drops of essence of lemon. Do not beat after adding the flour. Bake one hour in a slow oven.

SUPREME NECTAR.—Put into a nine-gallon cask six pounds of moist sugar, five ounces of bruised ginger, four ounces of cream of tartar, four lemons, eight ounces of yeast, and seven gallons of boiling water.
Work two or three days. Strain, add brandy one pint, bung very close, and in fourteen days bottle and wire down.

LEMON PRESERVE.—Take one pound of loaf sugar, six eggs (leaving out two whites), the juice of three lemons, the rind of two, grated, and a quarter of a pound of butter. Put these ingredients into a saucepan, and boil gently over a slow fire until they become thick, and look like honey. It will keep good for twelve months.

CHEAP AND INVALUABLE DENTIFRICE.
Dissolve two ounces of borax in three pints of water. Before quite cold, add thereto one teaspoonful of tincture of myrrh, and one tablespoonful of spirits of camphor. Bottle the mixture for use. When used, add water.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

We have again to report a very quiet market in nearly every branch of trade. Cotton, Sugar and Molasses presenting, in fact, the only exceptions to the general inactivity. The demand for our leading staple has continued active, but at lower rates, in accordance with the further decline reported at Liverpool. Sugar and Molasses have been in good request at full prices. Nothing of any moment has been done in Tobacco; and the sales of Western Produce have been of limited extent, without any material variation in quotation.

COTTON.—We noticed in our last report that the market closed without any notable decline from previous rates, but with a market leaning to inside figures. Ordinary being quoted at 12½ to 13c. Good Ordinary at 13½ to 13¾. Low Middling at 14½ to 14¾. Middling at 14¾ to 15c, and Strict Middling at 15 to 15½, since which, under the influence of the unfavorable foreign news noticed above, prices have declined ½ per lb. On Saturday the market opened inanimate and drooping, with less eagerness on the part of buyers, who, moreover, claimed concessions to which factors were unwilling to submit; and although at a later hour the latter evinced a willingness to meet the demand more freely, yet, still the movement continued sluggish, and the sales were confined to 3400 bales at prices indicating a decline of ¼c. On Monday the unfavorable tone of the foreign news, showing a further decline of ¼c at Liverpool, compelled factors to accept still lower figures, but the business, which embraced 4200 bales, was at very irregular rates, part of it being at about Saturday's prices, and the bulk of it, after the news, showing a further decline of ¼c. Tuesday the movement was still more animated. The demand was general, as well as active, and as the discouraging telegrams from Liverpool and New York led factors to meet it freely, 6400 bales changed hands at very irregular prices, a considerable portion of the business being at less than quotations, while the bulk of it was at Monday's figures, but with the advantage on the side of the buyer.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 14,000 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export. The weekly proper since Friday evening embrace 17,215 bales, against 20,217 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 3022 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 210,392 bales, against 307,715 bales the same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 70,515 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 33,350 bales to Great Britain, of 16,987 to France, and an increase of 54,061 to other foreign ports.

Referring to our remarks above, we reduce our quotations as follows:

SUGAR.—The demand has been very good, especially for the better grades of open kettle. Prices are very firm and are ruling with an upward tendency.

FLOUR.—The market has continued very dull since our last review, and the business doing has been mostly in a jobbing way at $7.75 per barrel for Common, $8 for Fine, $9.50 for Superfine, $9.75 to $10 for Bifigle Extra, $10 to $10.50 for Double Extra, $11 to $12 for Treble Extra, and $12.37½ to $14.50 for Choice Extra.

CORN.—The market has been quiet but firm. There were sales on Saturday and Monday of 4500 sacks at $1.05 per bushel for Ordinary, $1.05 to $1.10 for Mixed and White, and $1.15 for Yellow.

OATS.—Have been dull and prices were easier for buyers. On Saturday 130 sacks sold at 85c, but on Monday and yesterday 1500 sacks sold at 82 to 83c per bushel.

10,000 Words and Meanings not in other Dictionaries.

A necessity to every intelligent family, student, teacher and professional man. What Librarian is complete without the best English Dictionary?

The work is the richest book of information in the world. There is probably more real education in it than can be bought for the same amount of money in any language. Every paragon should have a copy at the expense of the parish. It would improve many pupils more than a trip to Europe, and at a much less cost.—N.Y. Christian Advocate.

Lay it upon your table by the side of the Bible; it is a better expounder than many which claim to be expositors.—M. L. Boat.
